
BY NSIMA STANISLAUS UDO (3524234)

Decorated Leg Band Used By Mbopo Initiates

A mini-thesis submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of M.A. in History, Faculty of Arts, University of the Western Cape

Supervisors:
PATRICIA HAYES
ANDREW BANK

Submitted in November 2018

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/
DECLARATION

I declare that Visualizing the Body: Photographic Clues and the Cultural Fluidity of Mbopo Institution, 1914-2014 is my own work, that it has not been submitted for any degree or examination in any other university, and that all the sources I have used or quoted have been indicated and acknowledged by complete references.

Full Name: Nsima Stanislaus Udo.
Date...9th November 2018

Signed.....

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/
Dedication

This study is dedicated to my “uyai mbopo”, Patience Nsima Stanislaus and my lovely daughters, Afonama and Anamakan, whose commitments and sacrifices have helped me to complete this study.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

I express my sincere thanks to Patricia Hayes of the Department of History, my teacher and supervisor, who has patiently guided me through the course of this research. You have been my academic “matriarch,” on whose scholarly tutelage I learn how to think critically with photographs. Thank you to Andrew Bank. You have shown that an academically inexperienced student can be capably guided by erudite supervisor. Your scholarly input and commitment to my work, your encouragements and detailed readings of my thesis far outweighs the duties of a co-supervisor. I am grateful to Leslie Witz, head of Department of History for his encouragement and support. I thank Ciraj Rassool, Paulo Israel, Uma Dhupelia-Mesthrie, Nicky Roseau, Suren Pillay, and Premesh Lalu who have directly or indirectly, through their engaged scholarly work have contributed to expanding my understanding of contemporary historical themes in a critical manner.

I acknowledge the Centre for Humanities Research, UWC, whose fellowship award has been the mainstay of financial support for the two years of my Master’s study. The CHR has been a kind of an intellectual home that offered me a platform for multilayered theoretical and scholarly interface with other scholars from other institutions. I thank Ms. L. Lalkhen, Ms. J. Brandt and Ms. J. Smith for logistic and administrative support while pursuing this study.

I am very grateful to my dear wife, my uyai-mbopo, Ima-Esit mi, who has endured my absence even when I am present, in an attempt to complete this study. Your commitment to my life-work and my children is a blessing from God. I thank my wonderful and brilliant daughters, Afonama and Anamakan who have on many occasions been deprived of the fatherly hugs and cuddles as I toiled day and night, reading, researching and writing this study. May the Almighty God grant you the ability to reach your God-given goals in Jesus’ name.
CONTENTS

Declaration i

Dedication ii

Acknowledgement iii

Contents iv

List of Images v

Abstract vi

Introduction

Visual Clues and Fragments: Changing Interpretations of Mbopo Ritual, 1914-2014 1

Chapter One

“The Seclusion Room”: Visualizing the Mbopo Ritual beyond the Body 29

Chapter Two

Mbopo Ritual: Social Change and Cultural Continuity, 1914-2014 68

Chapter Three

“The Re-Invention of Tradition:” EbonyLife TV Show and other Recent Recreations of Mbopo, 2008-2014 93

Conclusion 113

Bibliography 117

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/
LIST OF IMAGES

Fig. 1.1  J. A. Green “Akenta Bob in wedding dress, c.1898,” 31
Fig 1.2  Fattening House Women (1) 36
Fig 1.3  Fattening House Women (2) 36
Fig 1.4  A “maiden” immersed in prayers by the pool 43
Fig 1.5  A tree shrine for sacrifice before seclusion 43
Figs 1.6 /1.7 Young mbopo initiate being massaged with white chalk and herbs 47
Fig 1.8  Hairstyle with facial motif signifying Adiaghawo 51
Fig 1.9  Elaborate hairstyles of initiate 51
Fig 1.10  Elaborate hairstyle with hair extension and brass comb 52
Fig 1.11  Elaborate hairstyles with beads 52
Fig 1.12  Skin decoration and temporary tattoos with dyes and herbs applied by a matron 55
Fig 1.13  Nsibidi wall drawing by mbopo initiate, c.1912 60
Fig 2.1  Chief Daniel Henshaw with his family 75
Fig 2.2  Ibibio Chiefs with Attendants 75
Fig. 2.3  Two decorated mbopo initiates seated in the midst of admirers 83
Fig 2.4  Decorated leg bands worn in the place of awok 86
Fig 2.5  A genital mutilation of a baby-girl 89
Fig 3.1  Advertisement shot of The Fattening Room women 96
Fig 3.2  Sally the South African with body painting and a raffia necklace 100
Fig 3.3  Inductees rehearsing the ekombi dance steps that they were taught earlier 102
Fig 3.4  Ekombi dancers performing a dance along with inductees 103
Fig 3.5  Koko Ita-Giwa during her marriage in Calabar, 2014 106
Fig 3.6:  Mechanisms in Uyai by Imoh Imeh, Cover page, Daughters of Seclusion 107
Fig 3.7  Group of dancers performing the “Young Maiden dance” in Texas, USA, 2012 111
ABSTRACT

The mbopo institution, popularly known as the “fattening room” is a cultural rite of passage for young virgins, who are being prepared for marriage among the Ibibio/Efik people of southern Nigeria. It is a complex cultural institution which marked the change of status from girlhood to nubile womanhood in Ibibio/Efik culture. This study examines the practice of mbopo ritual among the Ibibio/Efik people across the previous century. Through an engaged and detailed visual analysis, the study argues that in the first decade of the 20th century, the mbopo ritual had a degree of vibrancy with an attached sense of secrecy and spiritual mystery. But between 1920 and the present, this vibrancy and spiritual undertone has been subtly but progressively compromised. A buildup of tension on the ritual by modern forces, not only of the outside missionaries, but also indigenous converts set in motion a process that would eventually transform the ritual from a framework of an actual cultural practice into the realms of “cultural reinvention” and re-rendering. Feminist critiques of the 1980s and the 1990s led to the popular awareness of the damaging impact of clitoridectomy, just one core aspect of the ritual. As a direct result, clitoridectomy was outlawed across the country, leaving mbopo to be seen as a morally suspect practice. In recent year, the once vibrant, secret and spiritually grounded rite of seclusion for nubile women has been reimagined and reinvented through the public display in art, painting, cultural dance troupe, music and television shows.
Introduction

In June 2013, in the city of Calabar, six young women were hosted to participate in The Fattening Room reality show. This was a live TV series, an attempt to remediate and display on television screens the experiences and cultural characteristics of the Ibibio/Efik women’s rite of passage called mbopo.1 Young African women were invited to engage in an extended period of rigorous pampering and learning. “The cast consisting of Stephano Unachukwu (Nigeria), Rosdyn Ashkar (Ghana), Patricia Kihori (Kenya), Tshepo Maphanyanye (Botswana), Sally Berold (South Africa) and Limpo Funlika (Zambia),” were advertised as being taken through “a journey of self-discovery as they explored the rich Ibibio/Efik marriage custom and tradition for 30 days in the (so-called) Fattening Room, a reality show that has its setting in Calabar, the Cross River State capital.”2

For one month the reality show was aired live across different African television channels, as these young African women entered the Efik/Ibibio women’s seclusion rite embellished with a modern twist.3 The Fattening Room reality show, though realistically staged in a video cast and television format, was not of course “real.” The Fattening Room was theatrical, directed towards entertaining its viewers. While trying to entertain, the reality show seemed to posit itself as a visual defense of African traditional culture, tacitly addressing the misunderstandings that surround the Ibibio/Efik female rite in a televisual form. The show tried to present the Ibibio/Efik female seclusion rite, mbopo, as more than just fattening-up, but as an all-encompassing female-centred induction process which is culturally friendly and able to accommodate initiates from outside Ibibio/Efik land and Nigeria. The show also attempted to portray the female rite more than an ancient rite where girls are housed within a secluded area, where they are forcefully fed to the point of fatness to appeal the Ibibio/Efik patriarchal yearning for a voluminous female body. The show rather tried to reposition mbopo as culturally fluid, a ritual that can fit into contemporary modernity with some form of acceptance.

---

2 Ibid.
3 Ibid.

While engaging with the show, it prompted my inquiry into the cultural fluidity, inconsistency or otherwise of West African cultures and, in this case, the mbopo ritual of the Ibibio/Efik people of Nigeria. Through the possibilities offered by photography and other visual media as potential forms for historical analysis, this thesis examines the changing contexts associated with the practice of mbopo across the twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. While dwelling on the corporeal, it examines other very important components of the institution that go beyond the body. It uses the corporeal aesthetics embodied in the compositions of the photographs as entry points into the analytics of the extra-corporeal components of mbopo ritual.

What is the mbopo women’s rite of passage? Mbopo is a cultural institution, a rite of passage for young virgins, who are being prepared for marriage among the Ibibio/Efik people of southern Nigeria. It is a cultural induction and schooling process through which young women are secluded, culturally and traditionally coached and prepared for marriage as brides who are able to manage their homes, are sexually active, emotionally stable, and are able to bear, suckle and nurture their children to maturity. It is a complex cultural institution which “marks the change of status from girlhood to nubile womanhood”. Young marriageable women are given education about marital relations, body beautification, sexuality, copulation, reproduction and work. It points to the way the society tries to control the sexuality of young women in an attempt to locally preserve the particularity and uniqueness of each local community.\(^5\) It signals a process through which young girls are initiated into womanhood, equipped with knowledge, skills, and social and psychological resources that will ensure their identity, and will enhance maximum contribution and belonging to the socio-cultural structures of the Ibibio/Efik society.

---

How do photographs and other media forms generate “visual clues”\(^6\) in order to unpack broader cultural features of the mbopo ritual “beyond the body” and beyond the “fattening room” perception? How do photographs and documentary films help to articulate and historicize the cultural volatilities and fluidities, the “continuities and changes” in the cultural practice of the mbopo ritual between 1914 and 2014? Is the version of mbopo as practiced today or as presented by The Fattening Room show in 2013 essentially the same as the form practiced in 1914 when the female ethnographer Dorothy Talbot undertook a detailed study of the institution?\(^7\) What components of the institution have been jettisoned over the period and why? What components remained? Finally, is there an abiding value in this long-standing cultural ritual when seen in relation to other aspects of Ibibio/Efik society? These are the questions in this thesis I seeks to address.

This research is predicated on my position as an “insider”. I am an Annang/Ibibio man\(^8\) and have some personal background knowledge of the institution though I am not an initiate. When I was growing up in the early 1980s, it was common for young women to anticipate going through \(^8\) The Annang group is a subset of Ibibio people. They have common language with the Ibibios and share almost all forms of cultural affinities. They are believed to have come from the same ancestry. See U. Essien-Udo, The History of the Annang People of Cross River State, Nigeria (Calabar, Apcon Press, 1983).

---

the rite of seclusion, the ekuk mbopo rite. This expectation was talked about among peers within my community, both men and women. But the expectation it evokes has widely diminished in recent decades. This research tries to analyse the changes that have attended the institution across a century, beginning with the amalgamation of Nigeria as a British Protectorate in 1914. It also analyses how different historical timelines and epochs, in particular colonialism, the introduction of Christianity, Nigerian independence and the Civil War, have influenced the practice of mbopo, as well as its changing degree of acceptability within the Ibibio/Efik sociocultural setting in contemporary times.

In traditional Ibibio/Efik culture, as in other African societies, girls who were found to have upheld their virginity until marriage were viewed with pride. Those who were found to have had premarital sex were stigmatized by being debarred from partaking in the mbopo institution. They were given pejorative names and were mocked in folksongs and puppetry displays. Girls who were inducted through the mbopo ritual were certified by some established indigenous verifiable mechanisms to have been virtuous. The very action of being debarred from participating in the seclusion rite was seen as a means of control against “deviant behavior”, and was to instill “decency” in society.

Mbopo is unlike the Mauritanian lablouh, the fattening and circumcision culture where young women of reasonably young ages are gruesomely circumcised and forcefully fed to the point of being forced to eat their vomit.\textsuperscript{11} It is also different from the girls’ circumcision culture of Gabon which contradicted feminine secrecy as epitomized by Owanto’s \textit{La Jeune Fille a la Fleur} exhibition of naked mutilated girls.\textsuperscript{12} \textit{Mbopo} seclusion rite emphasizes certain aspects of feminine spirituality, morality, etiquette, character and vocation. While it involved female circumcision in the past, it was highly secretive. Pamela Brink asserts that when she did fieldwork in the 1970s, no person was allowed to view or to photograph the moment of the operation.\textsuperscript{13} The ritual also gave credence to inculcating social values and etiquette that the marriageable girls should possess in preparation for womanhood, motherhood and their lives as wives. While certain aspects of the ritual like clitoridectomy, the partial cutting of the clitoris were held in secrecy, other aspects of it, like the “outing ceremony” were highly public displays where the family and the community were involved in celebrating parades.

---

During the seclusion rite in the past, marriageable girls were secluded and pampered for anything between three months and three years. This period of seclusion was not fixed. It was subject to different determining variables like the wealth of the parent of the initiate, the age and health of the initiate, the uniqueness of the cultural particularity of certain communities within the particular area of Ibibio land. These factors determined how long initiates were secluded.

According to Imo Imeh, the \textit{mbopo} seclusion rite accentuated the Ibibio/Efik philosophy of beauty, where beauty was seen not merely as the aesthetics of physical appearance but also of the beauty of character, based on sound morals. Thus, the corporeal engagement around the beauty of the initiate, the use of ornaments and other beatification materials in the seclusion process was a signification of the expected outcome of uyai mbopo, the beautiful bride, “who symbolizes everything that is pure, beautiful, brilliant, resplendent and resilient”.14

\begin{thebibliography}{9}
\end{thebibliography}

Seclusion presupposes two important factors: one, the family internally celebrates the expected initiate for the honour of fidelity that she has upheld; and two, it epitomizes the absence from the family that the girl will experience at the consummation of her marriage. The young woman is secluded from family interaction, being attended to by female elders who are themselves former initiates. These elders must be past child bearing age and be members of certain women’s organisations like “the Nyama women’s society.”15 Thus, the initiate is secluded and kept from her family for a period, as she hopes to prepare for a long absence from her family, when she relocates to her new home at the consummation of her nuptial celebration.

In pre-colonial and pre-mercantile Ibibio/Efik society, the mbopo ritual was standard for nubile girls to pass through before marriage.16 This had been the case before the emerging changes that contested its morality and practice. New cultural influences brought about by European contact with the Ibibio/Efik people, particularly during the colonial era in Nigeria, influenced the receptivity and the practice of mbopo. European socio-cultural concepts were presented during the colonial era as more civilized and better than indigenous practice and cultures. On the other hand, the pervasive impact of Christianity in the region contested the practice. The conquests of the autonomous societies of eastern Nigeria (which depended on the assumed invincibility of their “time-honoured gods and medicine men” before the British confrontations) by colonial forces, shook the foundation of traditional beliefs and cultures. And Christianity, which was perceived as the secret of the white man’s power, proliferated.\textsuperscript{17} Christianity began to take a foothold in the Ibibio/Efik region in the 19th and early 20th centuries. Mission stations headed by white missionaries played an active role in social and political change within the region, serving both as havens for indigenous refugees and victims of British devastations, and providing local information for British colonial agents and consuls.\textsuperscript{18}

---

16 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 76.

The Church of Scotland Mission (the Presbyterians) led the way in 1846.\textsuperscript{19} They proselytized indigenous Christians, who were converted to think that traditional cultural practices were esoteric, pagan and idolatrous. They were made to see indigenous practices such as the mbopo women’s rites as rituals invested with animistic beliefs. Early ethnographies suggest that such rituals were often preceded by sacrifice and libations to Eka Abasi (the Mother God), sacred pools, venerated trees and the ancestors.\textsuperscript{20} Though the missionaries also opposed the fattening up of prospective brides on the grounds of health,\textsuperscript{21} they vehemently condemned the sacrifice of animals during ceremonies and rituals. They held that such rituals were contradictory to monotheistic Christian beliefs and should be considered as religious anathemas that must be jettisoned.\textsuperscript{22}

\begin{thebibliography}{9}
\bibitem{19} A. Afigbo, “The Eastern Provinces under Colonial Rule” 425.
\bibitem{20} D Talbot, \textit{Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 76-78.
\bibitem{22} D Talbot, \textit{Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 76-95. See also A. Afigbo, “The Eastern Provinces under Colonial Rule,” where he analyses how the Presbyterians mission, and later the Qua Ibo (1887) and the CMS Niger Mission (1893) had vigorously and radically challenged traditional practices such as polygamy and the killing of twins as being morally inadequate for Christian converts. Again he establishes how the offer of Western education which came along with missions proliferation, and which indigenous religion could not offer was a strong tool and attractive bait for social change and cultural dynamism along prescribed Western lifestyles.
\end{thebibliography}
The emerging feminist critique from the 1970s challenged what they regarded as “the mutilation of the female body”, particularly through female circumcision, in certain African cultures.\textsuperscript{23} The changing social structuring of busy city life in contemporary Ibibio/Efik metropolitan centers like Uyo, Calabar, Ikot Epene for example and the unimagined social transformation attested to by the apparently seamless global connections through the internet and other media routes of the twenty-first century also unsettled the favourable social topography that will have allowed for the practice of the \textit{mbopo} ritual until recent times.

Despite the contemporary diminishing organization of the practice among Ibibio/Efik people due to the influence of modernity and the impact of Christianity,\textsuperscript{24} the practice seems to maintain some traceable presence, particularly in the interior hinterlands and villages, and even in some metropolitan areas. Imo Ime’s recent ethnographic observation of \textit{mbopo} initiate in 2006 shows that the ritual is being practiced among some Ibibio/Efik communities in contemporary times.\textsuperscript{25}

\textbf{Mbopo in historical perspective – a literature review}

The \textit{mbopo} institution of the Ibibio/Efik people of southern Nigeria has received sporadic and uneven scholarly attention. Whether colonial, foreign or indigenous, scholars have approached the institution from different disciplines with different theoretical framings, mainly those of anthropology and art history. Also available are some articles in newspapers, magazines or online posts, which focus on body fattening as the defining frame of the institution. This is concomitant with the popular nomenclature of “fattening room” or ‘fattening house” used to label the institution. For example, an article published on Nairaland.com, a Nigerian online news

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{24} M. Jeffreys, “The Nyama Society of the Ibibio Women” 51.
\item \textsuperscript{25} I. Imeh, \textit{Daughters of Seclusion}, 61.
\end{itemize}
forum, presents the mbopo institution mainly as a fattening room where unmarried women are subjected to miserable three to six months ordeal of no-work-and-all-food-and-sleep, to emerge as “obese brides.”

Oyeronke Oyewumi calls for researchers to comprehensively analyse African cultures from the standpoint and understanding of local and indigenous backgrounds. As a follow up to this call, this research is based on my position as an Annang man (a subset of the Ibibio group). Having lived across different Ibibio/Efik communities in Nigeria, and being familiar with this component of Ibibio/Efik culture, I felt a responsibility from a sense of kinship to offer a view, in this case as an “insider,” to the body of literature available on the mbopo institution.

The intent of this research is to “visualize closely”, then analyse and historicize the wider context of the practice of mbopo beyond the body. It seeks to contribute to the recent Africanist literature which tries to reflect on the practice of mbopo as a complex and culturally rich ritual: a women’s rite of seclusion, instead of the myopic and parochial framework of the “fattening room” appellation epitomized by Western-inspired debates (and recycled in the TV reality show). I draw inspiration in particular from Imeh’s stimulating recent study where mbopo seclusion is conceptualized as “performative demonstrations of love and care (and character) through the public display of opulence.” It can further be conceived as an inductive and pedagogical process for the development of an Ibibio/Efik bride consonant with their conception of beauty and cultural affinity.

---

This thesis thus conceptualizes the mbopo institution from the standpoint of indigenous practice, and the history and culture of the Ibibio/Efik people of Nigeria. It examines and analyses the cultural volatilities, fluidities, “continuities and changes” that have attended the practice of mbopo between 1914 and 2014. It examines and analyses how mbopo has evolved over the period, considering the wider sociocultural components that have impacted on the institution.

The study examines how “modernity”, Christian values, and the emerging discourse on the rights of the woman and children have influenced the cultural practice of mbopo.

The literature review here centres on ethnographical and historical studies of mbopo institution, as well as theories of photography. It is grounded in the theoretical framework of photographs (and films) that hold possible “clues” that can be used as evidential models for the reconstruction of history as theorized by Carlo Ginzberg. It is further framed around the concept of “cultural fluidity,” the theory of continuities and changes in African cultures as posited by W. R. Bascom et al. Thus, this research engages with literature that cuts across photography, film, and the history and anthropological study of the mbopo institution and cultural studies in Africa.

Photographs, documentary films, TV shows and written documents are used to generate “clues” to historicize the complex sociocultural constitution of the mbopo institution “beyond the body.”

It try to address the cultural changes that have attended the institution from 1914 up till recent times as represented in early anthropological literature on the mbopo institution, and as observable through the medium of still and motion pictures.

The first systematic published research on the mbopo institution came to light in 1915, a year after the amalgamation of Nigeria as a single political entity by the British colonial government.

---

Ethnographer Dorothy A. Talbot, wife of P. A. Talbot, who was a colonial District Commissioner in Ibibioland between 1914 and 1915, gave an extended description of the institution.\textsuperscript{31} Talbot’s account is an ethnographic description of a secret ritual rather than a theoretical analysis of its social, symbolic and semantic signification. Her monograph is structured around a “visual narrative”,\textsuperscript{32} consisting of forty-four photographs, to authenticate and illustrate her highly exotic account of a “primitive people”. There are photographs of Ibibio “maidens,” women, totems and secret pools etc., which she took during her ten months of her ethnographic collaboration with her husband. I analyse some of these early photographs by Talbot in close detail in the following chapters.

In \textit{Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People: The Ibibio of Southern Nigeria}, Talbot sought to narrate the ethnography of Ibibio communities “from the woman’s point of view”.\textsuperscript{33} She believed that there were aspects of the Ibibio/ Efik life to which the white male ethnographer had limited access, and thus it needed a woman to observe and interact with local women without restrictions. In Chapter 6 of her book, titled “Maidenhood to Marriage”, her narration centres on the \textit{mbopo} institution. While not focused on the body, she elaborates in detail the spiritual aspects of the institution. She frames her book around James Fraser’s concept of non-Western cultures as being shrouded in magic with esoteric attention to allegedly secret societies and “religious cults.” Talbot asserts that the \textit{mbopo} ritual was “the first great event in the life of an Ibibio maiden.”\textsuperscript{34} She argues that before and after the \textit{mbopo} rite, “a sacrifice is offered to the indwelling naiad (water-mermaids)” inhabiting secret pools or streams, and “age-old trees” that the inhabitants of certain communities worshipped. She sees this sacrifice as an act of appeasing Eka Abasi (the Mother God) in order to draw down blessings of fertility and productivity for new crops, since the ritual was usually observed prior to the beginning of a new planting season.

\textsuperscript{31} D. A. Talbot, \textit{Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 1-15.
\textsuperscript{33} D. A. Talbot, \textit{Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 2.
\textsuperscript{34}Ibid.,76.

Thus, mbopo was one way through which the Ibibio/Efik people expressed their spirituality, by interceding with and seeking the hands of the divine for fertility and prosperity for a newly formed family, and the community at large.35

As a novel ethnographic study of the institution, Talbot depended largely on local informants, almost exclusively women.36 She records a very important constituent of the institution: the spiritual ritualism of the mbopo institution as practiced in early decades of the 20th century. On the other hand, she pays little attention to the cultural induction process and other important aspects of the institution, notably its social function in relation to regulating gender roles and its educational function in relation to the training of young women. This mini-thesis addresses these gaps, and redirects focus to other cultural aspects of the institution, including the changes that have attended the institution since Talbot’s research.

A decade later a colonial officer named Mervyn Jeffreys conducted a study of Ibibio/Efik women’s rituals around Ikot Ekpene district in the then southeastern region of Nigeria. In his much later published ethnographic description of his experience in the 1920s, Jeffreys documented the duties and cultural functions of a women’s society that he called “*Nyama.37

These women were the matriarchs, female elders responsible for the process of mbopo induction.38 “The Nyama society” controlled the mbopo rite of seclusion, making sure that only

35Ibid., 76-77.
36Ibid., 4.
37 In Ibibio language, Nyama means singer. It could also be a name attributed to certain divinities that were being worshiped among some Ibibio/Efik groups. See M. Jeffreys, “The Nyama Society of the Ibibio Women”, 15.
38Ibid., 15.
girls who were still virgins were chosen for seclusion. This society, he asserted contributed to checking promiscuity. They also oversaw clitoridectomy. The central argument in Jeffreys’ analysis is his critique of the efforts of the missionaries to outlaw the practice. As a British colonial officer in Nigeria during a period when forms of indirect rule were being introduced across African continent, Jeffreys had a political investment in protecting African traditions from outside interference. He lamented that the mbopo ritual was diminishing due to the influence of the European missionaries.

Around the time that Jeffreys, now a social anthropologist at the University of Witwatersrand in South Africa published his narrative of the cultural contests in this colonial ritual, a pair of American anthropologists, John and Betty Messenger, conducted what might be considered as the first professional modern anthropological study of social change in Ibibio land. They included analysis of changing forms of mbopo. In 1951 and 1952, they conducted ethnographic research among the Annang. They focused on religious acculturation and collected a large body of data on folklore and sexuality. They were interested in the “discontinuity in cultural conditioning,” and cultural change: Christianity, spirituality, sexuality, and social values in Ibibioland were analysed. They analysed the practice of mbopo as a form of premarital engagement, and noted that mbopo seclusion rites still afforded a space where initiates were taught on the practices and taboos associated with sexuality. They asserted that among the Annang, coitus was only expected after the initiate had been married in the assembly of her kinsmen and later incorporated into her new home through a ritual. In her new home, the mbopo

---

initiate was presented with her first adult clothing and first had sexual relations with new husband in her marriage bed.\textsuperscript{42}

After Nigerian independence in 1960, the focus on the cultural practice of the \textit{mbopo} institution began to change from the context of rituality to “body size.” This was as a result of an increasing perception of corpulence as a societal gauge for beauty, wealth, power and health among Ibibio/Efik communities. Around this time also, contemporary awareness of the adverse impact of large body size became prominent in scholarly literature and public debates.\textsuperscript{43} In \textit{Social Aspects of Obesity} (1995), Igor de Garine et al assert that “obesity and its pathological consequences” has been the focus of Western scientific discussion for some decades. But in studying groups of people outside Western metropolitan societies, they assert that “moderate fatness, storing energy in the form of fat has indisputable adaptive consequences including successful reproduction”, particularly where inconsistent productivity and food scarcity is a threat. To them, Western conceptions of obesity, medical or psychological, are an inappropriate generalization of the understanding of body fat without consideration of other cultural contexts and diversities.

In her essay “Fertility and Fat: The Annang Fattening Room” in the above edited volume, medical anthropologist Pamela Brink develops this cross-cultural analysis in a detailed case-study of the \textit{mbopo} ritual. She asserts that the “Annang view on obesity is a positive one, with the perception of ‘fat as beautiful’.”\textsuperscript{44} While centering on body size as the motivation for seclusion, and in a refreshing view, she reiterates the Annang’s beliefs in the stimulus for fattening seclusion. She records indigenous perceptions on the gynaecological role of fatness, since fattening could broaden the hips and birth canal for a less uncomfortable delivery of babies.\textsuperscript{45} Brink asserts that in the earlier years, \textit{mbopo} was widely practiced among the Ibibio/Efik people, as “part of a traditional religious system… associated with marriage and custom of bride price.” This is because, to the Ibibio/Efik people, fertility was regarded as a very important driving force.\textsuperscript{46} Young marriageable girls were also taught the art of pleasing their husbands sexually. Yet, as she insists, the ritual had many different social functions, including education about “sex, marriage, procreation, child-care, hygiene, wife-craft, mother-craft, home economics, and social and cultural etiquette”.\textsuperscript{47}

\textsuperscript{42}\textit{Ibid.}, 36.

The most sustained and creative modern intellectual engagement with \textit{mbopo} has been that of Imo Nse Imeh, an Ibibio-American scholar. With a genuine insider/outsider position, and with broader anthropological and art history perspectives, Imeh’s 2012 study analysers the institution and tries to provide a balanced evaluation and summary of the \textit{mbopo} institution and the concept of the \textit{uyai mbopo}, the beauty/character connection. In \textit{Daughters of Seclusion: The Revelation of the Ibibio “Fattened Bride” as the Icon of Beauty and Power}, Imeh adopts the art history method of object/image analysis and elaborates many facets about the cultural practice and aesthetic performance of the \textit{mbopo} ritual among the Ibibio/Efik people. He conducted extensive fieldwork, interviewing former initiates and stakeholders of the institution, both males and females between 2002 and 2006. He carried out an ethnographic study through personal observation of the \textit{mbopo} initiation, particularly the seclusion and outing ceremony of one

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{45}Ibid., 81.
\textsuperscript{46}Ibid., 76-77.
\end{flushleft}
Comfort Ukponetto, an mbopo initiate in Ediene Atai village in Ibibioland.⁴⁸ These experiences helped him develop a significant and insightful analysis into mbopo and how to interpret it from the framing perspective of Ibibio cultural life.

Imeh’s study gives voice to the continuity of the practice of mbopo among the Ibibio/Efik people in recent times. His art history background, through isolating a visual aesthetics that are uniquely part of Ibibio/Efik culture, extensively analyses “the materiality of mbopo ritual”, and how these aesthetic materials define the mbopo ritual as “a conceptual art form” which finally produces a woman healthy in her proportions and beautiful character, representing everything that is pure and magnificent, “an icon of beauty and power”. ⁴⁹ Imeh re-imagines the ritual as “time, transformation and translation” of the beautiful bride.⁵⁰ He addresses how the mbopo ritual reveals the Ibibio/Efik cultural perception of uyai (beauty), which incorporates an element of empowerment. He states that after so much work and time has been expended in the transformation and re-presentation of the beautiful bride to the world in her final outing ceremony, the bride represents the combination of beauty and power⁵¹.

This thesis distinctively and firmly locates the mbopo ritual within visual theory and history. It looks extensively into other aspects of the ritual beyond corporality, about which Imeh has also provided analysis. Furthermore, I analyse social change in relation to other cultural and social features of the Cross River people. This is done through close visual analysis of photographs and documentary films.

---

⁴⁸ I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 61.
⁴⁹Ibid., 9.
⁵⁰Ibid., 31.
⁵¹Ibid., 176.
Photographic clues: an analytical resource for the historical reconstruction of mbopo

In trying to “visualize closely” so as to generate potential clues for this research, this thesis analyses photographs and documentary films in detail. How can fragments, or visual clues, help one to conceptualize the context of a larger entity? In this case, can pieces of photographs (and film images) considered to be fragments within a larger body of historical archive be analytically sustainable for the reconstruction of the history of mbopo ritual? Can a photograph become a viable evidentiary base for historical analysis? I draw on Carlo Ginzburg’s theory of “clues” and fragments of seemingly insignificant characters as viable pieces of evidence for establishing historical knowledge.\(^52\) Georges Didi-Huberman has called on historians to “imagine” comprehensively, to engage and think historically with images.\(^53\) I argue that photographs (and film images) can be used to generate evidentiary clues for historical reconstruction. They can also be used, along with other media and available written documents, to reposition, reconstruct and renarrate the history of the mbopo institution from 1914 to 2014.

A photograph has the potential to generate evidence for a reconstruction of historical narrative. Carlo Ginzburg asserts that when we engage with a photograph in detail, it is very revealing, showing the detail of content as well as the artistic quality of the image.\(^54\) In his book, Clues, Myth and the Historical Method (1989), Ginzburg draws on the concepts of connoisseurship, criminal investigative process and Freudian psychoanalysis to establish how miniature traces, symptoms, clues, pictorial marks, when studied closely allow for the comprehension of a deeper, otherwise unattainable reality.\(^55\) Historical knowledge is possible, not by “statistical

---

\(^{52}\) C. Ginzburg, “Clues: Roots of an Evidential Paradigm”, 98.

\(^{54}\) C. Ginzburg, “Clues: Roots of an Evidential Paradigm”, 98.

interpretation of data”, but by “indicial” knowledge, based on the collection, analytical conjecturing and interpretation of clues to attain a general knowledge of a certain reality existent in the past.\textsuperscript{56}

Clues and fragments drawn from visual images thus possess possibilities that can facilitate a deeper understanding of a certain historical event. A photograph has the potential to preserve events and features caught up and imprinted on surfaces which can be extracted, studied and analysed as historical evidence. While photographs have often been considered a complementary resource alongside written historical documents, Ginzburg usefully asserts that photographs should be treated in their own right and not fitted into pre-existing paradigms based on textual forms of analysis.\textsuperscript{57} Following this lead, this thesis uses photographs of mbopo initiates from diverse sources in an attempt to uncover silences and to open up new understandings of the history of the mbopo institution.

Similarly, in his analysis of the various components and faculties within what he calls” the photographic complex,” James Hevia states that photography “compressed time and space effectively and efficiently”. In his opinion, photography has the capacity to create a concurrent momentary connection between the viewer and the printed image, and at the same time can bring a distant remote space (and time) to the visual gaze of the viewer.\textsuperscript{58} This assertion is endorsed forward by Candace Keller. In studying photographic practices in modern Mali, she states that photography can be studied closely to explore the changing sociocultural topography of a people:

\textsuperscript{56}Ibid., 99.
\textsuperscript{57}Ibid., 96-125.
photographs can preserve clues, narrate history, and negotiate the position of the “social griot”. 59

As a “visual griot”, the social role of a portrait photographer, and by extension the photograph, is to preserve and archive images that present the way in which people live in the past, and at the same time historicize everyday activities and changing phases of cultural settings in visual forms. 60

Photographs carry certain signs and clues that are forms of rhetoric in which history unfolds. These clues are read as indexical signs inherent in photographs. They point to particular events that occurred in the past. 61 In other words, these indexical features lie in the image and the specific moment it catches within its frame. This alludes to the testimony of a “specific time space location” and the existence of the subject of the photograph within the frame. Photographs used in this study direct attention to specific features in the practice of mbopo among the Ibibio/Efik people at different times, thereby opening up new possibilities for historical analysis. In this regard, we might note Victor Burgin’s assertion that photography should be theorized not only as a technical practice but, more importantly as a “practice of signification.” 62

Photography’s social and historical significance borders more on its contribution to the production and dissemination of meaning. 63 Mbopo photographs that were taken across the last century concretely and comprehensively hold the potency to preserve, generate and disseminate connotations that form the basis for this historical research, when studied in conjunction with other available historical materials.

59 C Keller, Visual Griots: Social, Political, and Cultural Histories in Mali through the Photographer’s Lens (Indiana, Indiana University, 2008), 363-395.
60 Ibid., 363-395.
63 Ibid., 1-14.
Despite the obvious challenges encountered by historians in trying to connect fragmentary traces taken from photographs as evidence in relation to the whole, Elizabeth Edwards proposes that photographs offer an alternative framework “to think with.” She too sees them as “empirical, evidential inscription for historiographical contemplation.”\(^{64}\) She conceives of the photograph as a dynamic “visual incision” which inaugurates and offers new potential for historical narrative.\(^{65}\) She demonstrates how photographs have the ability to disrupt and unsettle dominant historical discourse. Photographs are recast as “raw histories” in their “unprocessed form” and in their unique function in truth-telling.\(^{66}\)

Photography thus represents the day-to-day imaging of the sociocultural, political and personal lives of individual, familial and cultural dealings in pictorial forms, depending on the collections within the photographic archive. A photograph memorializes events and moments, celebrative and non-celebrative events, trophy shots, real, posed or acted etc., which when engaged with as an evidentiary mode for historiographical analysis, opens up new perspectives about the cultural practices and historical antecedents of certain African communities. Photography thus becomes a “kind of writing”, imaging and documenting events caught up within a specific time frame, and conjointly creating narratives with other forms of historical “sources.” It is from this point of departure that I conceive of the photograph as having agency with regard to historical clues, a “kind of writing,” and as “visual griot”, communicating valuable historical messages to reconstruct the narratives of the cultural fluidity and changing characterization of the mbopo institution.

---

We also need to be attuned however, to the archival and textual framings of photographs, the divergent ways in which even the very same images can be mobilized for different political or ideological purposes. In one illuminating case study, Andrew Bank explores how portrait photographs of South African chiefs taken by a German photographer-turned-anthropologist, Gustav Fritsch, between 1863 and 1866 shifted from the “honorific, ethnographic-cultural” mode to a “repressive, physical-anthropological” mode. This, he asserts, was due to Fritsch’s later intellectual alliance with the Berlin anthropological community, whose objectives were the assertion through science of European (and particularly Prussian) racial superiority. But even “repressive” images can be re-mobilised in alternative ways. Thus Hayes and Bank reposition Fritsch’s racially repressive photograph of Maqoma on the front cover of their post-apartheid edited collection on “Visual Histories in southern Africa.” They question whether a Xhosa chief “shot” by Fritsch while in captivity on Robben Island might also again be reframed as “an icon of African military and political resistance”.

This reframing of images, they assert should not inhibit scholars from the task of investigating and historicizing the complexities surrounding how photographs are appropriated. This is because photographs and visual images can offer an entry point into understanding historical events and thus provide sets of evidence read within the context of the historian’s subjective representation of the past. It is in this very spirit that my own analysis of ethnographic images reproduced in the following chapters in this thesis seeks to reframe and re-imagine with emphasis on rereading visual details - the evidentiary potential of mbopo photographs in an Afro-centred re-narration of the history and practice of this ritual.

69Ibid., 4.
Although Dorothy Talbot’s ethnographic photographs of the mbopo initiates in her 1915 monograph may not be bound between any “honorific and repressive” binary, or set within the contradictory context between the image of the subject and the constrained conditions in which they were produced, her images remain trapped within the context of Eurocentric anthropological representation. This study reproduces and recontextualizes these photographs, along with other images “to think with as evidential inscriptions” and to reanalyze them “in a new moment of historiographical engagement.”

In this sense, I draw upon recent precedents in the dynamic new field of “visual anthropology.” In his essay “How the Yoruba See Themselves”, Stephen Sprague opines that photography can be used to show the cultural expression, values and the world view of a particular cultural group. In studying the Yoruba photographic practice, he establishes how photography has come to function as “literary record, memory device, and an object symbolizing respect and status” as practiced within Yoruba cultural settings.

The “traditional pose” adopted by the Oba, the king, other traditional elders, and young women in photographs depict status and hierarchy, according to Yoruba cultural values. The beaded objects and crown within the photographic frame opened up space for analysis, expressing the “dignified stateliness” of kings and traditional elders. Likewise, objects that are used by mbopo initiates are aesthetically symbolic in Ibibio/Efik culture. Photographs of initiates open up alternative historical analysis and nuance, and unsettle colonial historiography.

Again, in trying to analyse the historical changes that have attended the mbopo institution, this study heeds Edwards’ calls on historians to engage in analysis of photographs “beyond the

---

70 Ibid., 5.
71 This field opened up from around 1990 with the establishment of the US Journal bearing this title, allied very closely with the emergence of “Visual History” in African studies during the 1990s and 2000s.
73 Ibid., 240-259.
surface level evidence of appearance”, so as to unravel those historical clues and traces. Furthermore, Georges Didi-Huberman has also called on historians to engage with any available photographs to help redeem the past which is misrepresented or shrouded in silence. In his thoughtful essay, Images in spite of All, Four Photographs from Auschwitz, he engaged with and meditated on four photographs “snatched from Auschwitz” as evidentiary clues and models to untangle intentionally perpetrated bureaucratic silences of a heinous and brutal state system. Provoked by the unthinkable evils perpetrated in Auschwitz, and with the aid of the four photographs, he evocatively renarrates the histories of Auschwitz sufferers in an attempt to uncover silences that were deliberately orchestrated by genocidal cruelty of the Nazi SS. He calls on historians to reimagine within the frame of photographs and demonstrates how images can be read in productive historical ways. He submits that historians should take a closer look at images, generate clues and read them in context. The visual historian should therefore bring the entire visual image into consideration without omitting any part of the composition. This study attends to the content of the photographs in relation to other visual media. By such “close-up” engagements with visuals, clues and connotations are generated to problematize the lopsided “fattening room” appellation, and to reposition the history of mbopo as a complex and changing ritual.

Photographs of mbopo initiates represent the dynamic cultural practices inherent in the ritual. Looking at the entire visual composition it is necessary to include: the aesthetics; the body of the subjects; the surrounding space; and the decorative objects of mbopo initiates. The significations they exude challenge the existing misconception of the institution as merely a “fattening room”.

---

where initiates are fed to satisfy the patriarchal wants of the Ibibio/Efik man. They show the ritualistic decorative materials that connote the spiritual as well as inductive and educative undertones of the rite. Photographs thus offer a counter-narrative to reposition the parochial narrative of the mbopo Institution prevalent in some of the literature.

Thinking along with Imo Imeh and Udeme Nsentip on the concept of the beauty/character connection of the mbopo institution, colonial photographs, personal photographs of mbopo initiates and narratives within documentary films are analysed to establish the mbopo ritual as a seclusion rite of passage that incorporates corporeal beautification as well as spiritual and moral prettification of the Ibibio/Efik nubile woman. The institution is conceptualized as an “educational boudoir” where mbopo initiates learn the secrets of womanhood, body beautifications, details about sex, motherhood, childbearing, local songs, dances, artistic practices like wall painting, pyrography on cloths (and on other domestic and ceremonial objects), moral etiquette of the Ibibio/Efik family etc. The rite is “consummated” with the outward display and public outing of uyai mbopo (beautiful bride) as “an icon of beauty and power.” Photographs are used as analytical tools to detail the changing frame of mbopo practice in contemporary times by comparing mbopo photographs across time, and by analyzing the changes they represent.

While reproducing these photos in this mini-thesis, due consideration is taken to the sensitivities that may arise around visuals of women. Patricia Hayes has called for greater precision on the visibilities and textualities of photographs by people who work with visuals of women, in order not to replicate or reproduce the “sensitivities and power-laden issues around gender.” She thus proposes that an “ethics of articulation” be applied, where greater care is taken in reproducing gender related materials during research and publication to avoid making them “spectacles of shame.” In her exegesis and comprehensive theoretical exposé on the tondue photographs in postwar France, Allison Moore argues that the usage of feminine visual materials in books should not be seen merely as replications of “feminine sexual betrayal”, but they should be examined explicitly as texts and sites for “critical analysis of the politics of memory”, that offer a more immediate and affective elucidation in gender history than text. Working with visuals of female seclusion, this study pays close attention to the above assertion. While being guided by the “ethics of articulation”, I utilize photos of mbopo initiates as analytical tools for deepening of the history of the ritual.

---

80 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 3.

The concept of visual “clues” can also be applied to film. In this study, I engage with the several episodes of the Fattening Room TV show by Ebonylife TV, Nigeria, a live show broadcast in 2013 and aired live on television networks across Africa. The documentary films titled “Uncut, Playing with Life”, “Monday’s Girl” and Fat Houses are also analyzed. These films dwell on female initiation ceremonies of indigenous communities in southern Nigeria, and they try to expose the social stigma and health problems associated with female circumcision. They propose a total rejection and jettisoning of any form of cultural practice that mutilates and shames girls in African cultural settings.

The “visual griot” analysis of the photographer put forward by Candace Keller was earlier postulated to be the function of an African filmmaker by Ousmane Sembene. In 1978, in an interview with Francoise Pfaff, Ousmane Sembene, a popular and highly celebrated African filmmaker and novelist evocatively asserts:

The African filmmaker is like the griot who is similar to the European medieval minstrel: a man of learning and commonsense who is the historian, the raconteur, the living memory and the conscience of his people. The filmmaker knows the magic of words, sounds, and colors and they use these elements to illustrate – the past- and what others think and feel.85

In a collection of essays published in 1995, Robert Rosenstone foregrounds “how a visual medium, subject to the conventions of drama and fiction, might be used as a serious vehicle to think about our relationship with the past.” For Rosenstone, a film can be considered historical, when it “engages directly or implicitly, the issues and arguments of the ongoing discourse of history.” He asserts that just like history books, film is entangled with subjective underpinnings, yet needs to align with historical arguments that are already known.87 He asserts that since images can transmit ideas and information that words cannot handle, many filmmakers by “giving voice to the voiceless… have created a filmic equivalent of a New Social History. Such films treat the past more as a site of social meaning than of adventure.88

Robert Toplin carries the argument further. In Reel History: In Defense of Hollywood(2002), he claims that even though films may be inferior to books “as a source of detailed information and abstract analysis”, historians should develop a more open-minded view of cinema. He opines that

87Ibid., 72.
88Ibid., 8-9.
although filmmakers tend to leave out many details in order to make their film short and understandable, films “can communicate important ideas about the past.” The two-hour movie “can arouse emotions, stir curiosity, and prompt viewers to consider significant questions.”\(^{89}\)

Chapter outline

To conclude, I will give a brief summary of the central arguments in the chapters that follow. Chapter One: The “Seclusion Room”: Visualizing the Mbopo Ritual beyond the Body begins by analysing the cultural practices other than fatness that were associated with mbopo. It shows that “the fattening process” of the initiate did not depend only on sumptuous feeding. Vigorous massaging and skin treatment with herbs and oils, and the use of locally made bamboo beds were believed to facilitate fattening within the stipulated seclusion period. The chapter looks into history to reveal how that the other pre-seclusion practices, like affirming the virtuousness of the initiate and consecrating the initiate through rituals of sacrifice, were important components of the ritual process. These include spiritual ritual, induction, craft training, beautification, and training in womanhood and health practices. I conclude with my analysis of the debate over female circumcision, contrasting indigenous concepts concerning control over female virginity with recent notion of “genital mutilation.”

Chapter Two: Mbopo Ritual: Social Change and Cultural Continuity, 1914-2014 examines how the mbopo practices changed over time in history. Mbopo has changed from a necessary religious/spiritual engagement, which was the core motivation in the earliest historical record to becoming more concerned with aesthetics and a means of showing up wealth and the social status of a family or a clan. It follows the changing trend of the institution as an important ritual to a practice that was grounded in shows of wealth and aesthetics after the Nigerian Civil War.

These changes are seemingly influenced by Christian values, the sociopolitical situation in Nigeria and the emerging feminist debate of the 1980s, which sees female circumcision as an act of injustice against women and an abuse against the body and the rights of the girl child. The chapter concludes by analyzing a film, Uncut-Playing with Life documentary that was part of a campaign for the abolition of Female Genital Mutilation/Cut and which deeply influenced the view of the mbopo practice in the recent times.

Chapter Three: “The Re-Invention of Tradition:” EbonyLife TV Show and other Recent Recreations of Mbopo, 2008-2014 shows that while the general perception of Ibibio/Efik people about the practice of mbopo ritual has changed over the years, mbopo has rather been firmly appropriated, reimagined and supposedly reinvented within the realms of the media, arts and culture. This highly public image is evoked through TV shows, dance troupes, music, and visual and graphic art exhibitions. I provide close analysis of The Fattening Room reality TV show of 2013. Engaging with 22 episodes, and with screenshot images from the TV series, the chapter establishes the idea that the “reality show” was an attempt to create an illusion of how the mbopo seclusion ritual was practiced in the past. It argues that the reality show was a mixture of some strands of cultural practice within the larger context of activities that were influenced by contemporary hyper-modernity. The chapter ends by analyzing other activities like cultural dance troupes, music, and graphic and visual arts etc. as other forms of expressions of this “reinvention of tradition.”
Chapter One

“The Seclusion Room”: Visualizing the Mbopo Ritual beyond the Body

Contemporary scholars and students of art history, whose work I find energizing and useful and have drawn on extensively in this study, have attempted an aesthetic analysis of mbopo by looking at other components of the ritual than “fattening”. Based on their object/image analysis, an art history approach, they use photographs and other art images as a basis for their argument. They concentrate more on analyzing the representations of objects and images connected to mbopo as cultural motifs, and the depiction of the initiate as “an icon of beauty and power.”

But while they offer a very persuasive analysis of the mbopo institution as it resonates with the Ibibio/Efik philosophy of beauty, they still frame the ritual in aesthetic terms, which arguably reinforces emphasis on the corporeal. While corporeal attention for the mbopo initiate during seclusion (which includes corpulence, ornamental decoration, cicatrization, tattooing, tooth filing, the use of local herbs, oils, dyes and chalks on the skin, as well as the performance of extravagant femininity through the plaiting of decorative and elaborate hair styles) was an important part of the seclusion rite, this does not represent the whole.

This chapter analyses visual images to establish the different kinds of extra-corporeal activities that went on in the seclusion space, while also trying to show the changes over time within the practice of mbopo ritual. The chapter takes a glimpse into the seclusion space by analysing photographs, documentary films, historical texts, ethnographic data and reported information from former initiates as contained in a number of the written sources I use for this study. This is to “look into” and visualize the seclusion space “from the outside.” This is in order to be able to analyse mbopo ritual as an educational space, where the expected bride was temporarily removed from familiar persons and activities and secluded for the purpose of cultural education. This approach will help to clearly decipher those activities that took place within the seclusion space, and to define the mbopo institution more as a learning and transitional space than as a site of bodily transformation. I provide close visual analysis of photographs from the historical texts of anthropologists and more recent works in ethnography and art-history. I have also sourced select photographs and documentary films from the internet in an attempt to create “a visual archive” that resonates with this chapter’s objectives and this study in general. These photographs are reproduced and repositioned, and the videos analysed here in ways that afford space for my reconstruction of a narrative of the changing context of mbopo practices from around 1900 to today. A close scrutiny of these images, in relation to other photos of mbopo rituals, will allow us to unpack some of the layers of engagements and activities that took place within the mbopo institution beyond the body, and beyond fatness.

---

90 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, xix.

J. A. Green “Akenta Bob,” Bonny, 1898

I begin the analysis of the dynamism of the cultural frame of mbopo institution in history with a sophisticated and studio-like portrait of a Kalabari bride taken by Jonathan A. Green in 1898. According to Marta Anderson and Lisa Aronson, Jonathan Green was among the few Africans who took up photography as a profession in the late 19th and early 20th centuries in Nigeria. In a remarkable body of work, he produced hundreds of photographs “depicting everything from imperial events to local scenes, as well as portraits of both African and European men and women.93 Over three hundred of Jonathan Green’s photographs are held in different museums and archives all over Europe and in the Americas.94

---

Fig. 1.1: J. A. Green “Akenta Bob in wedding dress, c.1898,” Source: Anderson and Aronson.95

Jonathan Green worked along the coasts and harbour towns of Bonny in Southern Nigeria96 and was reputed to have taken the photograph of the popular 19th century Benin Monarch, Oba

93Ibid., 38
94Ibid, 38
95 This photograph is published in M. Anderson and L. Aronson, “Jonathan A. Green: An African Photographer Hiding in Plain Sight” and is said to be held at Unilever Art Archives in Port Sunlight, UK. They assert that the photo eventually appeared as a postcard circulated during colonial times.
Ovonramwen Nogbaisi, who was exiled to Calabar and imprisoned by the British Colonial Government in 1897.

The above photograph of Akenta Bob (Fig 1.1), a young Kalabari woman, was supposedly taken during her marriage ceremony. Though nothing is mentioned about “Akenta Bob” by Anderson and Aronson, it may be that she was the daughter of one of the rich Kalabari merchant chiefs who had established themselves as active middlemen and in business relations and contact with European merchants in the 19th century. Members of this elite frequently patronized Green’s photographic studio. According to Anderson and Aronson, most of Green’s photographs that feature African women were targeted at recording female initiations and rituals. Anderson and Aronson use this photograph, with fourteen other photographs, to analyse the enormous contribution of J. A. Green to African portraiture, a genre of colonial photography in Africa. They further suggest this photograph may have been taken by Green after Akenta Bob might have completed all the stages of her seclusion ritual.

Though the image is not specifically a portrait of an Ibibio/Efik bride, the spatial and cultural proximity between the Kalabari people, a neighbouring riverine community in the Niger Delta and Ibibio/Efik community of the Calabar River set along the same Niger Delta terrain, suggests close cultural similarities and affinities. I choose to draw from this photograph as a related semiotic image of an early Ibibio bride based on how the aesthetics, the composition of the supposed bride and the decorative materials she is adorned with have resonated with my knowledge of the ritual. The image brings into view several aspects of the history of seclusion rites in southern Nigeria. It portrays how the Kalabari people, and by extension the Ibibio/Efik people, celebrated marriage. It bears witness to the level of confidence with which such celebration imbued the new brides. It resonates with how in history, people of the Cross River Basin valued and reveled with nuptial seclusion – mbopo – around the late 19th and early part of the 20th centuries.

---

100 Ibid., 43.

At this time, among the Ibibio/Efik people, marriage celebrations in the public with an open bridal parade was a social precinct reserved for girls who had gone through seclusion, and who were deemed to be qualified by keeping their virginity before marriage. It was important for girls to pass through the rite of passage before they were married publicly to their suitors. The mbopo initiate was “closed in”, that is, secluded and attended to within a certain defined space particularly to gain some forms of spiritual, corporeal, vocational, sexual and social development.

Unlike several other women’s rituals of passage in some parts of Africa, where women or girls were secluded separately in a space detached from the family dwelling place, ufok mbopo, the ritual space for seclusion was generally a room in the family house or a separate hut within the family compound, which was converted temporarily for the purpose of seclusion ritual. The room was normally sealed off and cordoned from unwarranted persons. Strangers and the men in the family, including the father were barred from accessing this space. In the process of seclusion, a close arduous observation, attention and training were implemented by cultural matrons, former initiates themselves, who were elderly women with close family ties or contracted for that purpose\textsuperscript{103}. At the end of the rite, the initiate was expected to metamorphose from an uninformed and inexperienced young woman into an attractive and well-schooled Ibibio/Efik bride ready to access womanhood.

---

101 J. Messenger and B. Messenger “Sexuality in Folklore”, 34.

The subject of this photo (Fig 1.1) represents the kind of “Ibibio/Efik” bride who may have celebrated a public marriage after the seclusion rite. She seems to have been bountifully pampered and made ready for her nuptial engagement. The “Kalabari bride” looks confident and calm, exuding the mien of an accomplished young woman. The face is young and robust. She possesses the figure of one who may have just been inducted through the seclusion rite. Her decorative and ornamental adornments and her corporeal composition do not simply denote normal beautification, but announce her engagement as the after event of an important celebration of a female rite of passage: in this case marriage that comes after the seclusion rite.

Anderson and Aronson propose that the photograph might have been taken by J. Green after the initiate had completed all the stages of her seclusion ritual. But they also suggest that the there is a possibility that the image may be a staged reenactment of a female pre-nuptial ritual by J. Green for a family album\textsuperscript{104}. Though she is not plump around the abdomen, which may provoke Anderson and Aronson’s claim that the photographs may have been staged at a later time after the seclusion rite, yet through studying Talbot’s field notes of 1915, Brink asserts that there were cases of \textit{mbopo} initiates who “show no sign of obesity” or fatness.\textsuperscript{105} The composition in the photograph seems to resonate with outcomes of \textit{mbopo} initiation, post-seclusion. She is plump in her cheeks, with a glowing skin, and elaborately beaded from the head down to her ankles. She has a lavishly decorated coiffure and a wound wrapper which were consonant with mbopo garb post-seclusion and which are today reimagined and represented through the abang cultural dance troupe. Her posture radiates the disposition of a well-tutored young woman who might have gone through a kind of mbopo seclusion successfully. Her portrait speaks to the wealth of her family or her suitor, the expertise of her cultural matrons and the vicissitudes of her development during the rite of passage to become a capable Ibibio/Efik bride.

\textsuperscript{105} P. Brink, “The Fattening Room among the Annang”, 132.

This photograph was taken in 1898, about two decades before Dorothy Talbot’s 44 ethnographic photographs reproduced in Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People. When read in relation to Talbot’s photographs, they reveal the dynamism that was intrinsic within the Ibibio/Efik cultural economy and the Cross River Basin cultures in general. Both Talbot’s photographs of “fattening house women” and Green’s photograph of the Kalabari bride represent post-seclusion photographs, and point to the elaborateness of the activities within the seclusion space before the outing ceremony and the marriage public debut. Talbot in her book uses 44 different photographs to illustrate the so-called esoteric cultures of the Ibibio women.

---

106 A detailed analysis of the significance of beads and other decorative materials used in the mbopo seclusion rite is given in Chapter 2.

107 The abang dance troupe, which garbs themselves with the kind of a bogus wound wrapper in this photo is one of the ways the Ibibio/Efik reminiscence the beauties of the mbopo institution. This contemporary reminiscence is analysed in Chapter 3 of this study.
Among Talbot’s 44 photographs, which I find very important and stimulating for this research, only two represent the “fattening room women” directly. Other photographs of Talbot, some of which are also reproduced here, have auxiliary illustrative connotations, which relate to the cultures of Ibibio women in general. The two “fattening house women” photos (Figs 1.2 and 1.3 above) seem to have been taken of the same site, but from different focal angles. Through a close reading of the photographs, we can locate them as photographs that were taken of the same site and on the same occasion using both frontal and side portrait techniques. Andrew Bank argues that frontal portraits and side portraits were part of the language of ethnographic and anthropological photography of the time, and featured in numerous anthropological studies of the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

A close reading reveals similarities in the two photos. The box and the armchair feature in both photos; and a part of a person wearing a wrapper on the waist and standing on the right angle of Fig 1.3 can also be seen in Fig 1.2 at the far left side with his/her arms on the waist. Talbot uses the photo in Fig 1.2 as a frontispiece to transport her anticipated readers to what should be expected in the pages that follow. The initiates appear half naked and viewed from the side they embody the signs of seclusion. Their oily skins and plump bodies resonate with the “fattening room” appellation. This photograph presents the viewer with a mix of dressed and undressed people, a sign of cultural hybridization. Thus the photograph, rather than speaking specifically to the so-called “fattening room” ritual, visually amplifies the whole context of the eccentricity and primitivism of the Ibibio cultural economy compared to that of European civility. The image also relates to the femininity of Talbot’s research objective, “from the woman’s point of view,” where she claims that the particularity of her research focus could only be addressed by a woman researcher at that time.109

The second photograph (Fig 1.3) used in Chapter Six of her book to illustrate the secret practices of “fattening house women,” lacks any aesthetic appeal. The initiates confront the camera with apathetic look, and are adorned with very little decorated ornaments. There is no specific analysis that accompanies the photos in her text except for the caption “Fattening house women.” In a more general analysis, Talbot’s photographs are used in her book to illustrate, and to reinforce the readers to see how “fattening house women” look like in the early decades of the 20th century.

The frontal view of this photograph (Fig 1.3) engages our view. It draws attention to the rounded stomachs and rotund breasts of the initiates that foreground their experience of being fattened-up in their seclusion space. The armchair and the box symbolise the moment of honour when the initiates would take a sitting position at the centre of the market square. This position represents prestige and honour for the initiates. In patriarchal and endogamous Ibibio/Efik society of 1915, hierarchy was highly valued. The box could be an improvised seat provided for the younger initiates, to depict the seniority of the elder initiate who might sit on the armchair in a more exalted position. The fattened girl on right side in the photograph is bigger and taller, and appears to be the elder sister or relative of the other. Their facial resemblance suggests they are sisters or relatives, perhaps from the same polygamous family. During the early 20th century, and through to the 1980s, it was customary to find two or more sisters or relatives being secluded at the same time, perhaps for the purpose of managing resources and organizing time. These can be read through the photographs as we have photographs of mbopo initiates appearing in twos, and a few of them have been reproduced in this study.

109 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 2.

The photographs reveal certain commonalities that were inherent in Ibibio/Efik cultural practices. When put in context with other photographs of mbopo initiates from different periods and different parts of the Ibibio/Efik communities, they generate visual clues to understand the activities that went on in the seclusion room. At the same time they historicize “the ever-changing dynamic sociocultural climates” that materialised within the mbopo practices and between the urban and village settings in the Ibibio/Efik nation across the century. While the 110 Contemporary Ibibio/Efik society is more of exogamy than endogamy, where cultural frontiers and clan affiliation do not any longer determine marriage engagements. Just like their neighbouring Igbo who were immediately susceptible to change when they first encountered the Europeans in the last decade of the 19th century, the Ibibio/Efik have gradually changed in their cultural worldview, being deeply influenced by Christianity and the emerging modern sociocultural parameters. Messenger et al suggest that by 1919, the Ibibio/Efik people were still endogamous, but by the 1950s the community had almost turned exogamous completely. J. Messenger and B. Messenger, “Sexuality in Folklore”, 35. See also S. Ottenberg, “Ibo Receptive to Change” in W. Bascom and M. Herskovits, eds., Continuity and Change in African Cultures (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1959), 130-143.

urban photograph in Fig 1.1 indicates the use of elaborate beads and hair decoration to honour and beautify the subject, the “fattening house women” in Figs 1.2 and 1.3 use metallic leg bands, waist beads and polyester cloths that serve as flywhisks to make bodily beautification and to represent status. The sparseness of ornamentation of the “fattening house women” in Figs 1.2 and 1.3 might indicate their relatively modest economic situation. At the same time, it points to the high value and worth that was attached to mbopo seclusion rite up till the first few decades of the 20th century as a female rite that should be upheld irrespective of one’s economic circumstances.

From the above photographs, it is evident that in the 19th and early 20th centuries, some communities in the Cross River Basin preferred an elaborate loin cloth around the waist for initiates during the outing ceremony, or during marriage as in the case of the Kalabari bride. Other communities, particularly in the Ibibio/Efik hinterland far from the habour towns, preferred only beads with very little cover in the front during their coming out. At that time in some Ibibio/Efik communities, girls wore beads around the waist and ankles before puberty, and were called nkaiferi: uncovered girls. The miserly use of cloth on the mbopo initiate was also to foreground her virginity, as well as to present to the viewers the richness of her bodily fineness and corpulence after seclusion. According to Imeh, her body was seen as the site of inspection, rumination and the performance of beauty.

Again the rudimentary studio setting with white backcloth in the first photo above (Fig 1.1), which was supposedly taken after a marriage ceremony, cuts out the natural landscape and,

---

113 In his book, Daughters of Seclusion, Imeh suggests that the flywhisk held by the mbopo initiate is an emblem of power and status that the initiate garners during their outing debut, at least in the moment of their celebration. See also I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 218.
114 J. Messenger and B. Messenger, “Sexuality in Folklore,” 36. See Fig 2.2 in Chapter Two below.
115 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 107.
seemingly, allows the subject to readily prepare and set herself up, to create and preserve a certain type of identity she wanted to portray in the photograph. She is extravagantly decorated with beads from her head to the neck, the breasts, and the waist and on her ankles. Her lavishly worn beads and layered skirt or wrapper depicts an initiate who is connected to some elements of wealth and ostentation either from her father or her suitor. This kind of cultural garb points more to how the Kalabari and the Ibibio/Efik brides, and other Cross River communities who practiced women’s pre-nuptial seclusion rite, adorned themselves for the post-seclusion outing ceremony and during marriage, particularly in the emerging urban areas of the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

Judging from the facial dispositions of the “fattening house women” in Fig. 1.3, there is the possibility that the subjects of Talbot’s photographs were still carrying the burdens and the pangs of circumcision. Jeffreys asserts that up to the 1930s, certain Ibibio/Efik communities still practiced mid-seclusion circumcision, where initiates were being circumcised towards the end of the seclusion and prior to the outing ceremony. The photographs point to the difference between how life was conducted in the emerging Ibibio/Efik urban areas, particularly around harbour towns and colonial headquarters and administrative posts, and the interior hinterlands in Ibibioland in the late 19th and early part of the 20th centuries. “Akenta Bob” photo was taken at Bonny in an urban township setting where J. A. Green the photographer had his business station. It showcases a growing consciousness of aesthetic appeal and display of wealth that was possible among urban dwellers. By contrast, Talbot’s study was probably focused in the interior hinterlands, where the background shows luxuriant vegetation, but women stripped of lavish adornments, possibly on account of their relative poverty.

---

A spiritual initiation: water goddesses and ancestors in mbopo ritual (1915)

What then were the basic features or preceding practices that went on in a specific mbopo bedchamber under the tutelage of cultural matrons across history particularly around the first and second quarters of the 20th century? First, mbopo ritual, the pre-nuptial seclusion of a marriageable young woman began with the assessment of whether the girl had attained puberty.

In this regard in Ibibio/Efik social settings, there was no fixed age. While some communities loosely pegged puberty at between 15 and 18 years, others stipulated some uncertainties and fluidity regarding age. This was dependent upon the peculiarity and distinctiveness of the community involved. But there was a general consensus. In the early period, for example in the 19th and early 20th centuries, certain corporeal criteria were used to ascertain if a girl had attained puberty and if she was ready for marriage. In 1915, when official birth records were hard to come by, Talbot asserts that “the coming of the new and full breast,” what was referred to as mbobi, was one of the major considerations for a girl’s pre-nuptial seclusion rite. This was expected to happen around the second quarter of the teenage years through to her early twenties.

In Figs 1.1 and 1.3 above, the initiates look like late teenagers, in keeping with Talbot’s description.

Two dynamic factors played out before actual seclusion took place. In some instances, the girls were secluded when a prospective suitor or suitors had indicated interest in marrying them. On the other hand, girls could be secluded before an expected suitor indicated interest. Talbot asserts that in cases where the seclusion rite occurred before there was a registered interest of a suitor, certain signs were displayed in public places to signify that seclusion rites were ongoing. For example, fish racks, palm leaves or a miniature bamboo bed were tied in the market square or at the crossroads as a sign to woo prospective suitors. This system may have changed by the 1970s and the 1980s.

---

120 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 76.

Talbot expressly identifies different rituals that preceded the actual admission of the initiate into the seclusion space. For some communities that lived around coastal regions, sacred streams or rivers were revered. Such pools and streams were said to be inhabited by some naiads (water goddesses) who were believed to be responsible for the general wellbeing of the communities. Talbot asserts that before a young girl underwent the seclusion rite for the first time, they were led down to the edge of the stream where prayers were offered to the “naiad” for their protection. Fig 1.4 captioned “a typical sacred pool,” illustrates her emphasis on mbopo spiritual engagements with “naiads” before seclusion.

---

121 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 82. Though no mention is made around suitors’ intent in Jeffreys’ 1930s and Messenger’s 1950s research, it seems that Talbot’s’ assertions were held onto and practiced till around the 1980s when mbopo ritual took a dynamic cultural turn. One could only be secluded when there was a prospective suitor. See also J. Akpapan and M. Akpapan, “Mbopo Institution and Music”, 49-50.

123 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 76.
Secondly, Talbot also asserts that for some communities, preceding sacrifices before seclusion were conducted at the centre of the village where some very old trees were set aside and revered as being the site and shrine inhabited by their divinities, ancestors and other spiritual guardians (see Fig 1.5 above). Here, sacrifice and prayers were made to divinities, asking for help and guidance for the initiate. These streams and trees were believed to possess cleansing, invigorating and fertilizing powers of benefit of the initiate, the expected new family she represents and the community at large.\textsuperscript{124} Fig 1.5, which Talbot captioned “Juju tree of the compound shown in the background,” is used to illustrate the second ritual possibility, that which existed among Ibibio/Efik communities in their attempt at appeasing and consecrating initiates before seclusion. However, the thatched building behind the tree does not look like a living compound. It resembles a community hall of a kind that was always situated around such revered site even up till the present in some Ibibio/Efik communities.

\textsuperscript{124} D. A. Talbot, \textit{Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 80.

A closer look at these photographs (Figs 1.4 and 1.5) points to the enduring importance that the Ibibio/Efik communities attached to indigenous spirituality around 1915. The sacredness of the pool and the tree points to the animistic characteristics of indigenous religion. In Fig 1.4, the initiate is associated with a deep serenity symbolized by the still water and the thick vegetation canopy surrounding the pool. The mirroring of the initiate’s shadow on the water surface resonates with the claim that those naiads and the souls of the ancestors who inhabited those pools were all-seeing and all-knowing. The site of such revered pools were carefully chosen and managed, so that it could continuously evoke the aura of the enduring presence of these deified beings.\textsuperscript{125} Talbot further asserts that the success of the seclusion was tied to the claim that the ritual was overseen and sanctioned by deities.\textsuperscript{126}

The ancestors who were perceived as spiritual custodians and a source of succour for families were also invoked and revered during every important family function (including \textit{mbopo}) to ensure their protection.\textsuperscript{127} In the early decades of the 20\textsuperscript{th} century, and even in the recent times, the Ibibio/Efiks and their adjoining communities still maintain a “strong belief in the ancestors (the living-dead),” whom they believe are still alive in some invisible form in \textit{obio ekpo}, the land of the spirits. Ivan Ekong asserts that the Ibibio/Efik believe that the ancestors are still accessible even though they are dead: “hence the popular Ibibio proverb \textit{Ekpo akpa enyin Ikpaha utong} (It is the dead man’s eyes that die, not his ears).”\textsuperscript{128} In recent times, there is a continuing

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item A. Essien, “The Sociological Implication of the Worldview of the Annang People,” 32.
\item D. A. Talbot, \textit{Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 76.
\item I. Ekong, “The Ibibio Concept of Peace and Its Implications for Preaching: A Practical Theological Study within the Akwa Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria” (PhD dissertation, Stellenbosch University, 2014), 76.
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
practice of making prayers and offering libations using a local gin called ufofop or mmin Efik in honour of the dead. This is carried out among some Ibibio/Efik communities during certain family functions.\textsuperscript{129}

In some communities particularly among the Annang, this spiritual process was repeated after the completion of the seclusion process, and just before the celebration of the final parade of the mbopo initiate. In 2017, Godwin Obot, who interviewed his grand-mother who was a former mbopo initiate, asserts that a certain sacred day (usen ibed) and some significant ritual materials, like the white hen and nsei (a local ritual chalk), were used to consecrate and purify the initiate, as well as to thank the deities and the ancestors for guiding, refreshing and beautifying the initiate over the process of the seclusion rite.\textsuperscript{130}

Thus, from the early part of the 20th century, mbopo ritual had become one of the means of spiritualizing the initiates, introducing and connecting them into the spiritual worldview of the Ibibio/Efik. This was in connection with Ibibio/Efik religious beliefs which have endured. Before the coming of the Europeans, and the introduction of Christianity, Ibibio/Efiks communities attributed almost every event of life, good or bad, to the workings of ancestors, spirits and unseen forces.\textsuperscript{131} In the seclusion process, the initiate was taught to revere her ancestors, the divinities that they worship in their communities and Eka Abasi (the Mother God), who they believed was the final authority and the creator of the universe.\textsuperscript{132}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{129}Ibid., 76.
\item \textsuperscript{131} A. Essien, “The Sociological Implication of the Worldview of the Annang People,” 36.
\item \textsuperscript{132} D. A. Talbot, \textit{Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People}, 76.
\end{itemize}
Inside the seclusion chamber

After the sacrifice and the introduction of the initiate into seclusion, the activities that went on in the seclusion need to be explained in detail. The popular perception of mbopo seclusion is about fattening, as mirrored through the “fattening house women” image (Fig 1.3). The fattening-up process was just one of the activities the initiate went through in her seclusion. While analyzing the fattening process, it is necessary to bear in mind that the fattening process was not predominantly centred on weight gain as a mark of beauty. Historically, other social factors motivated fattening. In 1915, Talbot asserts that mbopo was thought necessary for the overall well-being of the initiate. This idea prevailed among the people up to the 1950s. John and Betty Messenger’s ethnographic studies of the 1950s among the Annang affirm that fatness was seen as a means to promote health, longevity, and successful childbearing. The idea of perceiving corpulence as a mark of good health was still evident among the Ibibio/Efik up to the 1980s. Pamela Brink reported on the research she conducted in the 1980s, that for the Annang (and other Ibibio/Efik groups), fattening was necessary because it created broader hips and a larger birth canal so babies could be delivered more easily. In a society where laborious farming activities were the bedrock of the subsistence economy, and where women were active in farming, fattening was conceived as a way to protect the would-be bride. It was a kind of a pre-marital “bridal holiday” for the expected bride, seen as a reward for upholding virtuous sexual chastity.

Having said the above, it is necessary to find out how the initiates were made to increase weight. The common assumption in most literature is that the initiates were force-fed in order to become

133 Ibid., 76.
135 P. Brink, “Fertility and Fat,” 77.
136 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 3.
rotund. While feeding played an important role in the fattening-up process, other activities speeded up fattening. In the seclusion space, initiates were made to lie on a wooden bed made with rounded bamboo or raffia branches without any bed covering. It was believed that the direct contact of the flesh and skin on the hard bamboo bed aided in massaging the flesh of the initiate, thereby opening up the flesh for freshness and fatness. This practice has endured from the early decades of the 20th century. Talbot asserts that miniature bamboo bed and fish racks were hung up as a signpost to signify an ongoing seclusion rite in 1915. The bed signpost points to the use of a bamboo bed in the past. The matron and her attendants also massaged the initiates daily with a local chalklike substance called ndom. Local oils and herbs were also used for massaging, to accentuate fatness in certain parts of the body. Fatness around the hips, the pelvis, the backside and the chest were the main targets, while the overall corpulence was considered as a sign of successful seclusion.

---

Fig 1.6 and Fig 1.7: Young mbopo initiate being massaged with white chalk and herbs
Source: Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion.

---

137 D. A. Talbot, Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People, 82. See also Brink, “Fattening Room among the Annang”, 132.

The above photographs (Figs 1.6 and 1.7) are taken from Imeh’s Daughters of Seclusion. The images are screenshot photographs of a filmic scene, and the name Bassey as used by Imeh is drawn from a documentary film Fat Houses, produced in 2012 by Journeyman TV.\(^{139}\) Imeh uses them among 88 photographs chosen to both illustrate and analyse his art history and aesthetically-based analysis. His caption, “Bassey, a maiden of the Efik nkuho ritual, having her body massaged during her time in seclusion” suggests that this illustrates of how massaging of the initiate was perceived by the Ibibio/Efik as a process of softening, breaking up and remolding the initiate corporally. He uses the photographs to affirm the idea that corporal practices, like hand massaging of the initiate during seclusion translated into an “emotional, intellectual and spiritual reshaping and refining until she (the initiate) emerges as the ideal”.\(^{140}\)

The film and the photographs, whether staged or real, are used here to authenticate the narratives of the continuing residual practice of the mbopo seclusion rite in certain parts of Ibibio/Efik land in contemporary times. They also point to the carefully orchestrated attention the initiates received at the hands of traditional matriarchs. The hand of the massager is targeted at certain specific parts of the body like the chest and the hips. The film shows a progression while massaging from the leg area through to the hips and up to the chest and back. The synchronizing movement of the massager’s hands reveals the energy, attentiveness and importance of massaging. The Ibibio/Efik seclusion matrons conceived of massaging as a complementary ritual to assist the flesh in gaining weight.\(^{141}\) It was also meant to help tone the flesh and to enhance a sound psychological self-image during seclusion. Local chalks and other herbal concoctions

\(^{140}\) I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 131.

\(^{141}\) Ibid., 133.
were also used in this process as a form of “softening, breaking-up and rebuilding” the initiates to emerge as iconic women.\textsuperscript{142}

The weight increase of \textit{mbopo} initiates in the course of seclusion emblematizes the beauty of character, ethical formation and the creative ideas that the initiate acquired in her schooling bedroom. It would be unacceptable for the would-be groom, his family and the society at large if the secluded \textit{mbopo} did not exude the high moral standard, social etiquette and work prowess that she was expected to garner during her seclusion rite. Though great care and efforts were taken to ensure that the initiate was made fat, as represented by the massaging in the photographs above, fattening-up alone would not be able to reflect nor encapsulate such ethical expectations without other complementary activities. These included beauty treatments, merited ethics and social education. Thus, in addition to fattening, the initiates were practically taught the art of self-beautification by experienced matrons: self-beautification that would enhance their self-image, and at the same time would make them attractive to their husbands and wider community.

From the early 20\textsuperscript{th} century, skin care was considered as the first target in this beauty regime. Skin care was seen to be very important considering the harsh weather and environmental conditions of the tropical rainforest region where woman are exposed to the sun in the bush while farming. In 2012 J. Akpapan and M. Akpapan interviewed former \textit{mbopo} initiates: women who were septuagenarians, and who might have gone through \textit{mbopo} ritual in the 1940s and 1950s. Interviewees’ assert that the initiate learned about the different oils, dyes, chalks and herbs that are applied on the skin for effective skin protection and a glowing result. They learned how to make a local soap called \textit{atongnkom eyop} with the husk of palm-nut, and how to prepare a local oil called \textit{mmem} (soft), a mixture of different herbs and oil in the right proportions, which helps to soften the skin, as its name implies. This art of skin decoration and beautification endured and continued in the mbopo ritual up till 2012, as reported in the Fat Houses documentary film and the Fattening Room TV show. It is also evident from Imoh Imeh’s ethnographic engagement with Comfort Ukpongetto of Ediene Attai village in 2006.

\textsuperscript{142}Ibid., 133.

The hair was another area of physical attention during the mbopo rite of seclusion. Hair has been theorized as a “bodily indicator of cultural self-identity and social status” in African history. Several African communities have their distinctive ways of self-representation and identity formulated through hair styling. Nsentip Udeme asserts that Ibibio/Efik women take pride in the ways their hair is represented. During the mbopo seclusion rite, the initiates were practically schooled in how to weave different hairstyles and what these different styles symbolized. They practiced the performance of feminine beautification through the creation of decorative coiffures and elaborate hairstyles. Historically, among the Ibibio/Efiks of southern Nigeria, young women weaved and plaited their hair distinctively to epitomize their identities and status. Hairstyles would signify among other things, whether a woman was a virgin, single, married, a widow, a member of a particular women’s cult or a member of the chiefly family.

Hairstyling was also connected to concepts of spiritual power. In the early part of the 20th century, hairstyles sometimes were used to reflect and imagine the identity of the naiads which the particular community revered. Decorative materials used and the kind of hairstyle that the initiate wore revealed her spiritual background and what they believed. For instance, it is believed locally that mirrors and reflective materials were worn by those whose deities or ndem

---

144 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 26.
146 N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 4-5.
147 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 201.
were naiads that dwelled in streams and rivers. Such reflective items were believed to represent the seemingly unlimited knowledge of the deities and the ostentation attached to the beauty of such deities.\footnote{See for example, U. Affiah and J. Owan, “A Dramatic Analysis and Interpretation of Ekombi Dance of the Efik People of Nigeria”, \textit{International Journal of English Research}, Vol. 4, No. 1 (2014), 25-32 where they analyse ndem: water goddesses, as being extraordinarily beautiful and were believed to sometimes take up human forms by possessing extraordinarily beautiful women.} This was particularly true in rituals among the Efiks, the Kalabarís and other riverine chiefdoms located around Cross River and other connected tributaries. The subject in Fig 1.1: a Kalabari bride belongs to a community that had an attachment to the reverence of water goddesses. This can be inferred through the elaborate use of mirrors and reflecting materials in her hair.

\textbf{Fig 1.8}: hairstyle with facial motif signifying \textit{adiaghawo}: Source: Nsentip Udeme (2006).

\textbf{Fig 1.9}: Elaborate hairstyles of initiate Source: Nsentip Udeme (2006).
Working within the framework of visual art, Udeme illustrates the different hairdos customary in mbopo ritual, and analyse the meanings they invoke in terms of indigenous identities. He asserts that among the Ibibio/Efik, hairstyles epitomize aesthetic appeal and artistic rendition of skills of weaving with indigenously made hair extension materials.\(^{149}\) For the mbopo initiates in contemporary context, hairstyles sometimes emblematized particular forms of bodily representation. For example, there were hairstyles that were called mkpuk eba (new breasts), eba nkaifere (full breasts), Idet ubot (hand weaving without artificial extensions), effiom Inyang (crocodile), wobo (gather into one bunch), or ibuot ekong (the head of a warrior).\(^ {150}\) While they express love and sexuality, they also mark the status of the bearers as well as the elaborate extravagance that mbopo institution attached to hairstyles.

The above photographs are used by Udeme to simply illustrate the different hairstyles and facial motifs customary with mbopo initiation. They are being reproduced and repositioned here and captioned differently to resonate with my line of argument, as Udeme’s captions reference different hairstyles and face motifs. No mention is made with respect to the sources of the \(^{149}\) N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 4.

\(^{150}\) Ibid., 4.
photographs and when they were made. But we can infer from certain characteristics of the photos that they might have been taken around the 1970s after the Biafran Civil War. It was in this period that mbopo initiates began to wear clothing around the chest.\(^\text{151}\)

The photographs point to the dynamisms and diversities of practice that accompanied mbopo among the different Ibibio/Efik communities and along the Cross River basin. The photograph in Fig 1.7 particularly reveals how within a patriarchal Ibibio/Efik society, attention was paid to birth status and women were treated differently depending on their position either as the first born daughter and so on. Greater respect and special treatment was attached to adiaghawo, the first born daughter in a family. Specific facial motifs, beads and attires were used to decorate adiaghawo during her outing ceremony.\(^\text{152}\) Parents were expected to organize more elaborate festivals in favour of their first daughters. Their suitors were also expected to pay more in terms of dowry.

Cicatricization, tattooing and skin decoration with chalks, dyes and special herbs were also prominent bodily practices associated with the ritual. Though the practice of scarification was not particularly popular among the Ibibio/Efik, it filtered into some Ibibio communities through their Igbo neighbours. Jeffreys asserts that in the 1930s, in communities where clitoridectomy was performed in the first part of the seclusion period, scarification came immediately after circumcision. This was to allow the skin incisions to heal along with the cut on the clitoris, as particular procedures were observed during circumcision to enhance effective and quick healing of the scars. Circumcision wounds were treated with herbal concoctions.\(^\text{153}\) Unlike other parts of Nigeria where elaborate facial scarification was seen as part of physical beautification in history, \(^\text{151}\) J. Salmon, “Foreword”, xv. See also Chapter Two of this study for a historical analysis of cultural change in relation to the mbopo ritual.

\(^\text{152}\) N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 2.

the Ibibio/Efik preferred strategically placed dotted or pinched scars on both cheeks or by the side of the eye, which are referred to as ntoi uyai (beautiful dots).\(^{154}\)

ntoi uyai came along with elaborate skin decoration with designs made with ndom and odung (local dyes and chalks), signifying birth status through particular motifs. Skin decorations and inscriptions, a practice that endured through the century, were not permanent tattoos, but temporary skin inscriptions with local dyes. They were consistently inscribed and later washed off during the course of seclusion. It was believed to contribute to enhancing the overall beauty and softness of the skin. The cycle continued while in seclusion and was repeated during pregnancy and during other female ceremonies.\(^{155}\) The inscriptions and designs were aesthetically patterned and resonated with the Ibibio/Efik concept of marriage. Imeh asserts that the zigzag patterns inscribed on the initiate’s skin (see Fig 1.12 below) resonated with the other decorative body motifs that symbolized status.\(^{156}\) For example special designs were inscribed on the face if the initiate was adiaghawo (the first born daughter). And at another time, facial motifs were used to emblematize her sexual status as a virgin. Decorative motifs also pointed greatly to the Ibibio/Efik concept of beauty, and the artistic prowess of women passed down from generation to generation through temporary body inscriptions. These aesthetic motifs and designs were also utilized on pottery, raffia cloth weaving, as well as wall painting and floor designs with clay and mud.\(^{157}\)

\(^{154}\) I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 115.

\(^{155}\) N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 3.

\(^{156}\) I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 155.

\(^{157}\) N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 4-7.
Fig 1.12: Skin decoration and temporary tattoos with dyes and herbs applied by a matron: Source: Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion (2012).

The above photograph (Fig 1.12), taken by Jill Salmons in 1970 is analysed by Imeh in highlighting the intimacy of the relationship between the initiates and the cultural matron. With the image, he further affirms that tattooing and body painting of the mbopo initiate resonate well with the transition of the initiate’s social status, from an innocent nka ifere, a young girl, to a mature young woman, ready and able to assume womanhood. These body paintings were temporary, and needed to be washed away at intervals.

The dark background in the image depicts a serene inner seclusion room where mobility and accessibility was restricted. How did Jill Salmons, a European woman, a stranger, access this space for her photograph? It could be argued that in the 1970s, after the Civil War, cultural injunctions attached to rituals like mbopo had begun to be relaxed. Being a woman, Salmons might have better chances of access to their secluded space than a male researcher. In addition, mbopo’s secretive features have dissipated over the years. Imeh asserts that Comfort Ukponetto’s seclusion ritual, a recent mbopo initiate whom he was privileged to photograph in

---

158 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 75.
2006, “prods at the notion of family and the community” engagement into spaces that were hitherto private.\textsuperscript{159} The public began to seemingly engage with \textit{mbopo’s} activities that were restricted to the inner bedchamber, and were reserved for the attention of the matriarchs and a few attendants until the consummation of their final public debut. The re-imagination of \textit{mbopo} as reality TV “spectacle,” as analysed in Chapter 3, is one extreme expression of this transition from secret spiritual space to a ritual geared to the gaze of wider publics.

Social induction beyond the corporeal: sexuality, home management, literacy and industry

The \textit{mbopo} initiate was expected to learn special values and skills while in seclusion. These skills and values were to enhance her effectiveness as wife and mother, empower her to bring up her children, enhance her economic engagements and, at the same time, enable her to be able to socialize with the rest of the community efficiently.\textsuperscript{160} While many forms of learning went on in this educational bedchamber, a few important aspects are worth probing here. These are practices that on my reading had endured from the first quarter of the 20th century up till recent times. These were among the “woman’s mysteries” that Dorothy Talbot and Jeffreys encountered in the 1910s and 1920s. The anthropologist John Messenger documented these aspects (particularly on sexuality) more fully in the 1950s. As a wife to be, the initiates were intentionally taught about sex: sexual mannerisms including how to speak peaceably and alluringly, how to be “romantic” in order to excite and please their husbands sexually, and so on. The idea of “sexual education and techniques” being transmitted to the initiates within the seclusion chamber was entrenched in

\textsuperscript{159}\textit{Ibid.}, 155.
\textsuperscript{160} J. Akpapan and M. Akpapan, “Mbopo Institution and Music,” 51.
the belief and claim that women were the repository of sexual knowledge. They were expected to know much about sex in order to pass the knowledge to their husbands.

Within the seclusion bedchamber, initiates were also told how to manage the outcome of pregnancy before and after conception. Though there were professional midwives called abia uman, the seclusion rite offered the initiate some basic knowledge on how to manage pregnancy and childbirth. Messenger, Brink, Imeh and Akpapan all highlight the fact that the mbopo ritual prepared initiates for fertility, conception, delivery and successful suckling of their babies.
While the Ibibio/Efik believed that an ample female figure was necessary for fertility and eventual suckling of their offspring, the mbopo initiate was also taught the necessary herbs that could reduce labour pain and that would induce milk secretion for lactation.

The Ibibio/Efik attached great importance to fertility and still do so. Today efforts are made to have children and there is severe judgement, even ostracization of the barren. In fact, in the past, a certain form of seclusion rite known as nwo-nwo was prescribed as an attempt to cure a married woman diagnosed with infertility. The mbopo rite then offered the expected bride a site for sex education and fertility induction before marriage.

Nutrition is a central aspect of this ritual of learning to be an Ibibio/Efik wife. In her study of food among southern African cultures, Audrey Richards began by asserting that “Nutrition as a biological process is more fundamental than sex. It determines the nature of the social groupings and the form their activities take.” Her observation is equally applicable to West African societies. The Ibibio/Efik attach great importance to what they eat and how it is being cooked.

162 P. Brink, “The Fattening Room among the Annang of Nigeria,” 139.
163 Ibid., 139.
164 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 6.
165 A. Richards, Hunger and Work in a Savage Tribe: A Functional Study of Nutrition among the Southern Bantu
(London: Routledge and Sons, 1932), xvii.
The initiates were given some culinary lessons by an experienced elderly woman. The lessons were learned in two ways. While they had the privilege to feast daily on sumptuous and delicious meals like ekpang nkukwo, afia afere ebot etc. which are rich in starch, vegetables, seafood and animal protein, they were also taught the technicalities of preparing them. Yet for the Ibibio/Efik, food, nutrition and sex are interlinked. They believe that the road to the heart of a man is the mouth, thus the saying in Annang, Awonwan ano afere ibok, inwanake anwan ebe: a woman that can cook well does not strive to own her spouse. This idea has been tenaciously held by the Ibibio/Efik and still does so. While other components of the ritual may have been subjected to cultural changes, I would certainly claim that culinary interest is still deeply valued by the Ibibio/Efik.166

Invariably, when a woman is endowed with excellent cooking ability, she was thought to be able to keep her husband from possible infidelity without a struggle. She could secure her marriage with her cooking skills as she would receive complimentary appraisals and support from her in-laws.167 Mbopo seclusion therefore afforded the initiates the space to learn specific types of culinary preparations in order to be very competent in cooking delicious and healthy food. This would put her in good standing before her husband, her in-laws and the community to which she belonged. This is visually articulated in Fattening Room Show, which I analyse in Chapter 3.

The seclusion ritual helped the initiates to learn some vocations that can be perfected within the stipulated period of seclusion. This vocational training and the type of crafts they learned were culturally specific, depending on the communities to which they belonged. For example, some 166 This idea was clearly enunciated in my Honour’s mini thesis: “Imagining Home and Identity: Narratives of Members of the Ibibio/Efik Ethnic Association of Cape Town, 2014 – 2016” (Unpublished Honours Mini-thesis, History Department, University of the Western Cape, 2016), 50-51.

---

167 For its role in a diaspora Ibibio/Efik community see N. Udo, “Imagining Home and Identity”, 47-63.
groups specialized in basket weaving, clay wall and floor painting. Others were skilled in making raffia mats, cloths and roofing rafts etc. The Efiks specialized in comb making, embroidery, and how to make symbolic cloth called mbafari. According to Imeh, mbafari cloth originated from initiates’ innovations within seclusion and points to Efik cultural phenomenon that was primarily decorated with nsibidi ideogram.168

Other forms of cultural education and literacy went on within the seclusion chamber. Initiates received lessons in folklore, folksongs and stories that carry strands of history, moral lessons and cultural literacy. Nsibidi, a highly secretive hieroglyphic form of writing specific to southeast Nigeria, was particularly popular with powerful men’s societies like ekpe, ngbe and ekpo men’s societies, also resonated with mbopo ritual.169 According to Imeh, mbopo initiates received some measure of literacy in nsibidi from experienced elderly women.

The image in Fig 1.13 below is used by Imeh to analyse the artistic literacy and “practices that reveal female agency in learning and reproducing important designs” within mbopo ritual space. The image, photographed by Percy Talbot in 1912, is repositioned by Imeh to show the aesthetic prowess of mbopo initiates through “youthful rumination and imagination”.170 The mural shows that the seclusion period was not a period of inactivity, rather the initiates were engaged in reproductive thinking, and were trained in the art of writing, body decoration and drawing, learning the nsibidi writing patterns.171

168 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 77.
169 Ibid., 75.
170 Ibid., 56-57.
171 Ibid., 75.
Mbopo initiates could document the activities and period of their journey in seclusion through murals and the writing of signs. The various images in the mural (Fig 1.13) appear as symbols of the society to which the initiate belonged. The men riding on a boat on the left hand side of the drawing, the different kinds of animals and the beast of burden in a central position could denote a complex economy based on fishing, farming, hunting and pastoralism where the initiate came from. The images might also point to the different kinds of meat and fish that garnished the initiate’s meals, with reference to a society that was also given to hunting a lot of game within the Ibibio/Efik tropical rain forest. The three human images can be said to represent the different kinds of men’s masquerade cults like ekpo, ekpe and ekong who were responsible for maintaining social order in the society.

---

172 Successful hunting for games and wildlife was a laudable and corporate service among the Ibibio/Efik people up to the early part of the 20th Century. So it was worth memorializing the kinds of games one has feasted on during seclusion. Talbot also has a photograph of a “hunting scene” taken around 1915 in her book. A kind of a “trophy shot”, where about 40 indigenous hunters posed with their sharp hunting spikes, machetes and javelins and a hunted wild pig or an antelope lying in front of them. To have the opportunity of feasting with varieties of wildlife and domestic meat during seclusion was a great achievement attributed to the hunting prowess of either the father or the expected suitor. It was worthy of memorializing. D. A. Talbot, Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive Tribe, 13.
The triangular shaped images and the guitar-type symbol (central-right) might be reference to musical instruments in Ibibio/Efik land. We can discern the nkruk ubok, the hand gong, and the ikon etto, the xylophone, both of which were instrumental in producing sonorous music for the initiate during her outing ceremony. Akpapan and Akpapan have shown how music was utilized as a form of learning, entertainment and transmission of moral values to the initiates during seclusion. Practical lessons on dance and songs were also rehearsed. The practice of music and dance was reproduced in the Fattening Room Show, where the participants had repeated sessions where they learned local songs and dancing steps. In general, the mural fuses pictorial images to record the diverse experiences of the initiate in the seclusion, and the sociocultural features of the society where she belonged at that time.

Female Circumcision/Clitoridectomy

Female circumcision or clitoridectomy was a common component of the mbopo ritual. Talbot’s ethnography mentions clitoridectomy being practiced among Ibibio/Efik people in 1914. Across the Cross River Basin, there were different practices that defined mbopo initiation. But corporeal corpulence, character training and female circumcision seem to be the unifying factors that defined the seclusion rites across the region. However, Jeffreys asserts that clitoridectomy was not practiced among all Ibibio/Efik communities in the 1920s. For those who practiced it, he continues, the operation could either be performed at childhood or sometimes after puberty when the girl is considered nubile, either at the beginning or towards the end of her seclusion rite. The timing for the operation was very important, and mutilation of the clitoris was shortly after

---

173 J. Akpan and M. Akpan, “Mbopo Institution and Music,” 51 menstruation for effective management of the scar.\textsuperscript{175} This was supposedly to ensure the healing of the scar before the beginning of the next menstruation cycle. In the 1980s, indigenous informants told Brink that scarring from such a wound could hardly be seen once it had healed.\textsuperscript{176}

The World Health Organisation (WHO) defines circumcision as Female Genital Mutilation/Cut (FGM/C). It is further defined as "all procedures involving partial or total removal of the external female genitalia or other injury to the female genital organs whether for cultural or other non-therapeutic reasons."\textsuperscript{177} It further classifies FGM/C into four broad categories, namely: “I. Partial or total removal of the clitoris and/or the prepuce. II. Partial or total removal of the clitoris and labia minora, with or without excision of the labia majora. III. Narrowing of the vaginal orifice by cutting and bringing together the labia minora and/or the labia majora to create a type of seal, with or without excision of the clitoris. IV. All other harmful procedures to the female genitalia for non-medical purposes, for example: pricking, piercing, incising, scraping and cauterization\textsuperscript{178}. The Ibibio/Efik clitoridectomy can be described within the first category of the WHO classification.\textsuperscript{179}

The Ibibio/Efik believed that female circumcision, the partial cutting-off of the eyen itit (child of the vagina – the language they used in describing the clitoris), had fertility significance and could aid child bearing.\textsuperscript{180} It was believed that clitoridectomy had a social value, allowing for the survival of a clan through checking promiscuity. It was also perceived as a symbolic bodily \textsuperscript{175} M. Jeffreys, “The Nyama Society of the Ibibio Women”, 16.

\textsuperscript{176} P. Brink, “The Fattening Room among the Annang of Nigeria”, 139.
\textsuperscript{179} Sexual and Reproductive Health: WHO Classification of Female Genital Mutilation”, http://www.who.int/reproductivehealth/topics/fgm/overview/en/, accessed on 7 August 2018.
inscription for the celebrated virgin girl – “the sign of a blameless maidenhood.”  This idea was encapsulated in the language used in describing the operation. The operation knife was called udiong which means: to repair, to decorate, or to make beautiful. Only certified virgins were allowed to partake in mbopo ritual, and clitoridectomy was seen as a stamp that decorated such virtues. Though the operation was highly secretive and the scar was not meant to be flaunted for public display, its social relevance was embodied in the experience of mbopo ritual itself. Those who flouted the social order of sexual fidelity through premarital sex were exempted from participating in mbopo ritual as well as not being circumcised. In fact, Jeffreys claims that in the 1920s such delinquents were stigmatized through folklore and ribald songs, and given derogatory names like erut (to draw) or asangha ayan (walk long distance). Uncircumcised women were derogated because they were considered to be promiscuous and loose, women who walked long distant in search of men to satisfy their sexual cravings.

From the 1990s, however, campaigns were launched by Non-Governmental Organizations and government agencies against the practices of clitoridectomy in Nigeria. Activists identified clitoridectomy as a social ill and a harmful practice that violates the human rights of girls and women. They outlined the negative health implications attributed to female circumcision. Researchers submitted data to suggest that among the 28 African countries still practicing female circumcision, Nigeria was the most severely affected. They claimed that 28.7% of Nigerian women aged between 15 to 49 years were subjected to female circumcision. They further assert

---

181 Ibid., 16.
182 Ibid., 17.
184 Ibid., 16.
186 Nigeria: Current information on the practice of female genital mutilation; state protection available to those being targeted and the ethnic groups which it is prevalent (June 2001-October 2003), http://www.refworld.org/docid/403dd2080.html, accessed on 25 August 2018.
that about 20 million Nigerian women and girls had been mutilated or were at risk of being cut.\textsuperscript{187}

The campaign drew momentum from a 46-minute documentary film titled \textit{Uncut! Playing with Life} (1995). This film (which will form part of my analysis in Chapter 2) was directed by a Nigerian activist Chuck Mike and set in Benin City in Edo state of Nigeria. The documentary is a blend of very disturbing episode of child genital mutilation, interviews, theatre piece and voice-over narratives. It sought to affect “cultural revolution” in the practice of clitoridectomy in Nigeria.\textsuperscript{188} It resulted in significant activism after it visually amplified the abuses entrenched within the practice of female circumcision. It is significant that in November 1999, Edo State House of Assembly passed a bill criminalizing the practice of clitoridectomy in the state.\textsuperscript{189} This pioneering effort was followed by similar laws in another eight states in Nigeria. Thus in July 2000, Cross River State, where the Efik and part of Ibibio are resident, also passed a bill criminalizing the practice.\textsuperscript{190} Finally, on 25th May 2015, the new and overarching Federal Act, the “Violence Against Persons (Prohibition) Act, (VAPP)” was established. Consequently, the protracted efforts of the gender-based NGOs both locally and internationally, the responsive actions of the Cross River State and Nigerian governments in general, set a new paradigm for the practice of \textit{mbopo}. While maintaining the fattening up, cultural induction and aesthetic appeal, the ritual of circumcision became obsolete, unpopular and eventually discarded.

\textsuperscript{188}“Uncut! Playing with Life”, \texttt{https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=QsJTZeCoJSc}. A documentary film accessed on 25 August 2018.
\textsuperscript{189}Ibid.
\textsuperscript{190}Nigeria: Current information on the practice of Female Genital Mutilation”, \texttt{http://www.refworld.org/docid/403dd2080.html}, accessed on 25 August 2018.
Conclusion

The popular “fattening room” appellation limits our understanding of mbopo. While attention was given to corpulence, for the purpose of beauty and the ease of carrying and suckling their young ones, care was also given to other forms of physical wellness and prettification. While in seclusion, initiates received treatments and training on skin and hair enhancing skills. They were also taught practical skills in different patterns of extravagant ornamental decoration. Beads, reflective materials like mirrors etc., locally dyed ribbons, locally made hair attachments, local chalks and camwood, dyes and different kinds of oils like palm oil and shear butter etc. were utilized for corporeal care and enhancement for the mbopo initiate.

The mbopo seclusion rite was an avenue through which social order and decency was instituted in the society through the use of a celebrative reward mechanism before marriage. Nubile girls, who have attained a certain level of maturity, were intentionally secluded, cosseted, and at the same time schooled on the very important components of the Ibibio/Efik sociocultural dynamics: aspects that would help them in the transition to womanhood: first as wives and mothers, but also as members of the community. Apart from corpulence and other forms of corporeal beautification, initiates were also schooled in important aspects of sociocultural, sexual and health education, particularly on how they could manage themselves before, during and after pregnancy. They were taught to learn the knowledge of herbs that could enhance easy delivery of their babies, and other local remedies that were necessary to induce milk to suckle their young ones.191

191 P. Brink, “The Fattening Room among the Annang of Nigeria,” 139.
Before the seclusion rite, other preparatory measures were observed. Initiates had to be checked by designated matrons to certify that they were virgins and to ascertain their maturity for the ritual. Furthermore, initiates were spiritually consecrated to their deities and ancestors through rituals and intercessory libations performed around pools, streams or under older trees which a particular community revered as their site of spiritual affinities. They needed the support and bless of these deities and ancestors, to allow for a successful ritual. A successfully concluded mbopo ritual was perceived as an indicator for the wellbeing of the new family, and pointed to a good and productive farming season ahead.

There were of course significant changes in emphasis regarding these different aspects of the mbopo ritual. The early ethnographies from the 1910 and 1920s suggest that the secretive and spiritual emphasis was very strong in a period when colonial agents and missionaries were documenting and challenging indigenous cultural practices. In the 1950s and the 1980s, professional anthropological studies (Messengers and Brink respectively) point to a strong degree of diverse bodily and social component of mbopo. But the revolutionary break came in the mid-1990s, with the feminist critique against clitoridectomy, a practice claimed to dehumanize and demean women. The global and local campaigners, including a highly disturbing documentary in 1995, against what was now termed “Female Genital Mutilation/Cut” had direct legal consequences. Nigeria was identified as the most serious offenders in relation to what were seen as patriarchal and health-damaging “inflations.” Between 1999 and 2015, eight state governments (including Cross River State, home region of the Efik and many Ibibio) and the Federal government established laws that outlawed and criminalized the practice of female circumcision (FGM/C) in Nigeria.
This awareness set in motion a dynamic change in how mbopo was perceived and practiced. The ritual could no longer be associated with clitoridectomy, but came to be recast in much more public and fantasized forms as a beautification process. So, for example, in 2013, the Fattening Room Show did not mention circumcision as one of the components of mbopo seclusion. The ritual became more closely associated, including in dynamic new scholarly work, with aesthetics and seen as a means of showing the wealth and social status of a family or a clan.
Chapter Two

_Mbopo Ritual: Social Change and Cultural Continuity, 1914-2014_

The culture of the Ibibio/Efik of southern Nigeria has over the years experienced some dynamic changes and acculturation. Its ideas, customs, philosophy of life, worldview and social behavior have been modified. These modifications are as a result of its encounter and contacts with external forces as well as necessarily its own internal dynamics over time. Nonetheless, certain aspects of its culture still hold on, thus producing a modified version that is perceived as culturally normative. Bascom et al submit that “there is no African culture which has not been affected in some ways by European contact, and there is none which has entirely given way before it.” While African cultures continue to respond to external and internal dynamics, they also maintain strong residuals elements that define their unique identities and connect them with their ancestry.

The _mbopo_ ritual, a sociocultural institution that predominantly defined marriage among the Ibibio/Efik societies before the post-modern era, has witnessed some dynamic and traceable changes in its practice. European contact, Christianity, the emergence of feminist and social activism against female circumcision and related child rights, as well as internally generated developments like the Nigerian Civil War, have instituted modifications in the performance of the _mbopo_ women’s rite. In this chapter, I look at the period between 1914 and 2014 as the timeline for analyzing the “change and continuity” in the seclusion rite. Photographs and videos form part of the analytical tools that offer clues to unpacking these changes and continuities in this chapter.

---

Mbopo seclusion rites: challenges and changes, 1914 -1960

The year 1914 presents a very important point of departure for the historical analysis of the cultural fluidities of mbopo institution. It signaled the amalgamation of Nigeria as a single British colonial entity, when Southern Nigeria was administered together with the Northern Protectorate and the Lagos Crown Colony. The British imperial control now stabilized following several decades of anti-colonial skirmishes and British wars of control over ethnic groups in these regions. Southern Nigeria had also begun to feel the greater impact of Christianity.

By the early decade of the 20th century there were well-established mission stations across Ibibio/Efik land. For example, the Church of Scotland, through a “policy of concentrated evangelization” had brought Christianity close to the people by providing both spiritual and circular instructions within the compounds of different family heads. They established a self-governing colony in Duke Town and Creek Town on the fringes of Calabar, and had spread to other parts of Ibibio/Efik land. The spate of evangelization and proselyting had increased during the 1850s when Christian emigrants, Christianized liberated slaves, began to return home from Sierra Leone. The “European religion” which had filtered into the region had consolidated its influence by the late 19th century. Missionaries now directed their efforts towards challenging the indigenous spiritual and cultural beliefs of the Ibibio/Efik people.

---

194 Ibid., 393-394.
Mbopo was one of the rituals that was targeted in this period. In 1926, when M.D. Jeffreys served as one of the British colonial officers and a magistrate in Southern Nigeria, he reported that the traditional customs of mbopo seclusion and other women’s rituals were breaking up under intense missionary pressure. Through missionary education and religious proselyting, the missions were creating a new clan of young literate Christians. These indigenous Christian men and women and some of their Christianized parents became the contesting social and cultural front used by the missionaries to challenge the validity of the practice of the mbopo rituals in line with their new-found faith.

The first issue of contention was the spiritual and ritualistic connotations to the mbopo institution. Before the subtle but progressive changes that attended the mbopo ritual, mbopo had very strong spiritual connotations expressed through sacrifices and libations, like many other Ibibo/Efik customary practices. In 1915 Dorothy Talbot observed that “from a cord round the neck of each of the initiates dangled a live chicken, freely fluttering against the bare brown breasts of its bearer”. It is interesting that Talbot has no photograph to illustrate this. These dangling chickens were animal sacrifice used as spiritual channel to consecrate the initiates to their deities and ancestors. Jeffreys’ description of a mbopo outing ceremony in 1926 portrays an initiation rite that was overwhelmingly grounded in Ibibio/Efik spirituality. He describes how the arena for urua mbopo (the market square for the outing ceremony) was sited alongside shrines and alters of different ancestral deities. He asserts that there was only one ceremonial entrance into the arena, which consisted of a constructed arch tied around with an array of different kinds of juju, concoctions used as mediums for spiritual invocation. He further asserts that the mbopo initiates were also dressed with materials hanging around their necks. Their ankles were decorated with a number of “fluffy newly hatched white chickens” which were still fluttering, their wings having been partly severed through the neck with a knife. In fact, according to Jeffreys, he witnessed signs of animal sacrifice that still littered the ground, as the venue had to be consecrated with sacrifice the day before the ceremony. These were spiritual insignias used to consecrate the initiates before and after seclusion, and to appease the ancestors, seeking their support during the ceremony.

---

200 P. Brink, “Fertility and Fat: The Annang Fattening Room,” 75
201 D. A. Talbot, Women's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 83.

These spiritual rituals and sacrifices did not find favour with the missionaries and the emerging Christian community. Indigenous Christians came to believe that these kinds of indigenous spiritual and cultural practices were marks of paganism and idolatry. They were made to see indigenous practices like the mbopo women’s rite as rituals invested with animistic and non-theistic beliefs. Their new-found faith, coupled with the benefits that accrued from Western education, strengthened their conviction to resist practices that confronted their faith and allegedly undermined the dignity of women. Yet at the same time, they also longed to harness themselves to practices that defined the uniqueness of their identity. The result was a progressive modification of the mbopo seclusion rite. From the first quarter of the 20th century, European contact, and particularly the proliferating Christianizing project of the Western missionaries, led to cultural hybridization within the Ibibio/Efik sociocultural economy.

---

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/
Apart from the sacrifices and the spiritual connotations of mbopo seclusion rite, other traditionally established aspects of the rite began to be challenged by the missionaries and their converts. For example, mbopo was grounded in certain established ritual forms. Seclusion was specifically designed around usen ibed, sacred days and periods for performance of the rites. It was also stipulated when the initiate should be unveiled at her outing ceremony. Talbot plausibly insists that specific significance was attached to the ritual when the initiate enters or emerges from seclusion. This continued up to the 1920s and 1930s. Jeffreys holds that for those Ibibio groups in Ikot Ekpene region, anantia season (a stipulated ceremonial period that began around the month of July after the ritual ceremony of Nyama, a women’s matriarchy cult), was set aside for the entry into seclusion. Since these days and periods were dedicated to certain deities and localized naiads, Christian converts who were interested in modifying the seclusion rite began to challenge the authenticity of such days and periods.

The missionaries condemned mbopo as a “barbarous and hurtful custom.” Among their contentions was the perception of the seclusion process as centred mainly on “fattening,” and thus harmful. In addition, they claimed that the naked parade of initiates during the outing ceremony was a show of uncivilized sensuality and barbarism. The indigenous people claimed that nakedness in the context of unmarried virgins was for them a sign of “blameless maidenhood.” The missionaries’ unrelenting campaign against traditional spirituality and “esoteric” sacrifices, the fattening up process and the custom of nudity of younger unmarried

208 D. A. Talbot, Woman's Mysteries of a Primitive People, 85.
210 Ibid., 27.
211 Ibid., 27.

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/
girls – with their particular emphasis on the naked parade of "mbopo" initiates as a social abuse against the dignity of women set a different tone for the practice of "mbopo."\textsuperscript{212}

The missionary campaigns against "mbopo" came to be expressed in intergenerational tension within Ibibio/Efik communities. Jeffreys records that between 1926 and 1932, he received several reports by local chiefs who complained that some of their countrymen were not willing to seclude their children on "anantia," but proposed instead to celebrate their daughters’ seclusion rites over Christmas. They claimed that “it was the Church who altered the season.”\textsuperscript{213} The Christianization of indigenous people was therefore slowly modifying indigenous beliefs, and producing a continuing changing version of "mbopo" that tried to accommodate Christian concepts, while trying to maintain some form of indigenous authenticity. This was not possible without sociocultural tension.

From the early 20th century, tensions began to build up between conventional traditional practices and an emerging social consciousness motivated by Christian ideals that proposed for either a discontinuation or a modification of the practice. Young Christian converts were brought into tension with some of their parents who were deeply attached to traditions and rooted in their beliefs and thus refused to submit to the “white man’s religion.” The intergenerational tensions were intense. For example, Talbot reports that from around 1915, there were numerous court cases involving fathers who assaulted, threatened to kill, and even sometimes killed, their unmarried daughters for “disobeying them.”\textsuperscript{214} Jeffreys describes how in 1930, a Christian girl who was attending the Scottish mission school refused to become "mbopo" initiates and undergoes circumcision proposed by her parents. The Nyama women’s cult in charge of the process, with the support of her parents, forced her to submit her body to female circumcision. These tensions were brought before the newly established colonial court by Christians who preferred them to Native Court presided over by local chiefs.215

\textsuperscript{212}Ibid., 27.
\textsuperscript{213}Ibid., 25.
\textsuperscript{214}D. A. Talbot, Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People, 89.

The colonial government and their European agencies were in support of some of these practices as long as they did not challenge colonial administrative proceedings. This sometimes brought the colonial government into tension with the church. The Colonial Court was always careful in how they mediated over matters that were connected with cultural practices. Jeffereys reports on how, in 1930 and 1931, he was asked by the Nigerian Colonial Government to write reports on the mbopo seclusion rite and the practice of clitoridectomy by Ibibio women, in response to the petitions forwarded to the central government by the missionaries. “Missionaries take great exception to this practice… But it must be remembered that the Ibibio people are a long established and flourishing people. This custom, far from proving inimical to the community, is one that thrives and increases.”216 The colonial government responded by suggesting that the missionaries’ condemnation was a result of a misunderstanding of Ibibio/Efik concept of virginity and marriage. They supported the continuation of the practice, which they perceived as useful and effective as a social tool for “Indirect Rule” where local chiefs were empowered by the colonial government to keep the people obedient. Upholding aspects of African traditions, and avoiding tensions was an effort to work with chiefs to consolidate colonial rule and authority.217

216 Ibid., 26.
Fig 2.1: “Chief Daniel Henshaw with his family”. Photo: Dorothy Talbots, (1915).

Fig 2.2: “Ibibio Chiefs with Attendants”. Photo: Dorothy Talbot (1915).
The above photographs are representations of cultural hybridity that had started taking place in the early decades of the 20th century. Figure 2.1 is a photograph of one “Chief Daniel Henshaw with his family,” taken by Dorothy Talbot in 1915. Talbot uses this photograph to illustrate the appearance of a civilized Efik family. Her text reveals that Chief Daniel was a member of the new elite. He was also one of Talbot’s key informants. She claims he was more knowledgeable about secret information regarding rituals than his kinsmen. She describes him as a Native Political Agent suggesting that he was a government-sanctioned chief. Chief Daniel is seated in the centre of the family portrait between (what I take to be) his wife on his left hand side and perhaps his senior daughter on his right hand side. He was also a traditional ruler, head of one of the seven ruling families of the Efik dynasty. He is thus dressed in traditional regalia. His bidak, a locally woven hat that is normally crested with porcupine spikes, and the wrapper, usually worn by chiefs and elder statesmen, symbolize his chiefly status.

The women and the young girl seated in front are all fully robed in well-tailored Western-style dresses with no sign of traditional adornment. The man standing behind Chief Daniel is dressed in a suit and bow tie. He may have been the senior son or one of the relatives. His garb, purely Western, represents the kind of dress that marks the family as Christianity converts of the early 20th century.

Chief Daniel (perhaps a septuagenarian) and his family thus represent the emerging modern Christianized family of the early 20th century, the kind that would challenge some aspects of mbopo institution yet did not want to disconnect completely from their traditional identity. His Biblical first name “Daniel” very clearly marks him as a new generation Christian proselyte. He would have witnessed the earliest stages of Christian proselytizing around when the first baptisms were undertaken around the mid-19th century by the missionaries.\(^{219}\) He would have been rechristened by missionaries, perhaps during his baptismal ritual. His family represents a mixture of identities: a Westernized African family that would have resided in Calabar urban township, as well as showing an attachment or affiliation with their indigenous culture and identity. The backdrop of the photograph may well be the Calabar River that runs through Creek Town, where passenger ferryboats from Calabar have been berthing since historical times, and where missionary stations were first established in Calabar.\(^{220}\)

---

The second photograph with the caption “Ibibio Chiefs with Attendants” (Fig. 2.2) is equally instructive. Though no specific elucidation is given by Talbot about the photograph, except for the short caption that I have cited, the image reveals the complex cultural composition of an Ibibio/Efik community in the early twentieth century. Here the social group also set against a natural backdrop, in this case a village house with a thatched roof but aside an array of thick and lush tropical vegetation. The domesticated raffia trees and plantain trees in the background confirm that those photographed are members of subsistent-based rural community. Although there are signs of westernized influence in their dress, these chiefs are more obviously grounded in this traditional way of life (than Chief Henshaw). The chief who is directly under the umbrella in the centre foreground is attired in traditional regalia, yet wears a bowler hat and holds a walking stick. This esang ubong is a staff symbolic of a ruling chief in a particular constituency. He might even be a paramount chief. These objects set him apart from the other two men who are seated. The men on his left hand side represent subordinate chiefs. One of them dresses in the similar fashion to the paramount chief, though without holding the esang

---

\(^{220}\) Ibid., 350. This is based on my personal observation of the region and river.
ubong and a walking stick. The other man, is seated at the right end wears no hat and is thus implicit of lower status he seems younger.

Equally striking are the young girls, standing to the chief’s right hand side, who seem to be in their early teens. They are naked above the waist. This suggests that they are teenagers and unmarried. They were typically referred to as nka iferi (naked girls). Although this practice of upper-body nakedness among young women is not common today in the Ibibio/Efik society, this appellation still holds. Younger girls who have not married, and who are still in their teenage years or above, are still referred to as nka iferi.

Felicia Abaraonye suggests that woman’s nakedness in the public should not be seen as a form of sensuality as the missionaries liked to suggest, nor considered simply as an expression of patriarchy. Rather it was a marker and symbol of etiquette, even of women’s resistance. In studying the gender role of women’s traditional organizations among the Ibibio, Abaraonye argues that walking naked in public was a certification of one’s virginity for a young girl or a spiritual sign of a terrifying omen for an elderly woman. The naked appearance of an elderly woman in public in particular was a sign of resistance and stirred up strong female bonds expressed in the women’s matriarchal cult.

The women’s matriarchal cult she argues also played judicial roles in Ibibio/Efik community. Abaraonye affirms that it was an abomination for a woman to bare her sexual organs in the public against a man. This was believed to have the capacity to render the victim impotent and worthless for the rest of his life. It was therefore regarded as a taboo for a woman to invoke a curse on a man with her naked body except in extreme cases.\footnote{M. Jeffreys, “The Nyama Society of the Ibibio Women”, 25.} If any man was found guilty of rape or meddling with underage girls or even ridiculing women’s nakedness in public, he would be banished from his village, or could even be sentenced to death.\footnote{F. Abaraonye, “Gender Relations in Ibibio Traditional Organisations”, 221-222.} Thus, while nakedness symbolized virtue for young marriageable girls, it was also a social device for women’s protest and resistance.\footnote{G. Murunga, “African Women in the Academy and Beyond: Review Essay,” in O. Oyewumi, ed., \textit{African Gender Studies: A Reader} (New York, Palgrave Macmillan, 2005), 400.}

---

221 F. Abaraonye, “Gender Relations in Ibibio Traditional Organisations”, 212.

Let us now consider the dress and adornments of the young women in the photograph in more detail. The single strand of beads worn on their waists represents girls that have not yet been secluded into \textit{mbopo} institution.\footnote{I. Imeh, \textit{Daughters of Seclusion}, 176.} One of the girls wears a wrapper round her waist and holds something that resembles an animal horn, with loose beads as anklets. In traditional Ibibio/Efik politics, animal horns were insignias that represented one’s membership in men’s cults like \textit{Inam} or \textit{Mbio-owo}. A virgin girl, often one of the younger daughters of a chief typically acted as a cultural “amour bearer” carrying the insignias.\footnote{O. Akpabio, \textit{He Dared: The Story of Okuku Udo Akpabio, the Great Colonial African Ruler}, (Xlibris Publishing, Indiana, 2011),131.}

The late colonial era brought other changes. In his 1950s study of religious acculturation among the Annang, American anthropologist John Messenger shows the social changes in the Ibibio/Efik cultural life, particularly in the area of religion. In 1951, Messenger estimates that over half of the population of the Annang, and perhaps the entire Ibibio/Efik had converted by mid-century. He reveals that some Ibibio/Efik groups, particularly the Annangs, preferred to maintain their cultural practices along with their Christian confession, others practiced their culture in secret, beyond the gaze of the missionaries.\textsuperscript{230}

In an attempt to effectively analyse Annang response to religious proselytizing in the 1950s, Messenger undertook a focus group study and divided his Annang sample into three age groups namely, “men and women who were past middle age in 1919; the second, those who were young adults and middle-aged at that time; and the third, those born after intensive acculturation had commenced.”\textsuperscript{231} He thus asserts that despite the apparent evidence of intensive acculturation, Annang culture, and by extension Ibibio/ Efik culture, was best expressed by men and women who were of adults age in the early decades of the 20th century.\textsuperscript{232}

Cultural transformation and the revisualization of Mbopo: 1960 -1980

The Nigerian state gained its independence from British colonial rule in October 1960, an event that set in motion a new political dynamic now woven around competition between heterogeneous ethnic politics.\textsuperscript{233} In the early part of the post-independent era, the Nigerian state was accused of corruption, nepotism and ethnic-driven patronage in the government’s delivery of basic social services.\textsuperscript{234} The accusations climaxed in 1966, when disgruntled military officers staged a military coup. Though it failed, this coup set a stage for the crippling economy and eventually led to the bloody Civil War from 1967 to 1990.\textsuperscript{235} For three years, between 1967 and \textsuperscript{230} J. Messenger, “Religious Acculturation among the Annang Ibibio”, 291

\textsuperscript{231} Ibid., 293
\textsuperscript{232} Ibid., 293.
\textsuperscript{235} N Akingbe, “Creating the Past and still Counting the Losses”, 31-51.
1970, the whole of Ibibio land was in a state of turmoil. Whole villages were wrecked. Cultural practices were not priorities in a context dominated by survival and a search for safety. Precious traditional artifacts that had survived the missionary onslaught were reduced to piles of rubbles. The ruined or ransacked materials included cement sculptures, indigenous shrines and cultural moulds.

People tried to rebuild their lives in the aftermath of the war. They rebuild houses, schools, farms and hospitals and raised revenue for economic sustenance. According to Jill Salmons, a leading researcher of Nigerian cultural history, “the 1967 Civil War was a cultural watershed, and traditions that had existed for hundreds of years were abandoned in favour of a more modern life.” Salmons reports that during her fieldwork in Ibibioland in the 1970s, she witnessed what she calls a “compromised” version of mbopo seclusion where girls were secluded, not during anantia or Christmas as before the war but during summer holidays. Villagers now insisted that the mbopo initiates wear traditional attire rather than with “naked upper body” when appearing in public for their outing ceremony.

There are signs that the popularity of the seclusion rite declined in the post-war period. Pamela Brink asserts that during her fieldwork trip to the Annang community between 1974 and 1975, she did not witness any mbopo seclusion rites among the villagers, despite her efforts in trying to find sites of seclusion. The tensions that arose in the aftermath of the War had further changed the perception of the people around cultural practices. As some travelled to cities for greener pastures, they apparently got disconnected from cultural practices. For those who were left behind in this region, they were more engaged with the responsibility of rebuilding a new society.

---

The second historical-cultural factor that impacted on the mbopo ritual was the emergence of colour photography in Nigeria. It shifted the way mbopo was visualized. The ability to achieve a record in colour in photography was a long process. In 1907 Autochrome, an early colour photography process developed, patented and marketed by the Lumiere Brothers. It was only in the 1940s that Kodak released their first colour film, “Kodacolor”. Progressive improvement in quality, time of exposure, affordability and accessibility to the public made Kodacolor popular among amateur photographers, and thus popularized colour photography from the 1960s onward.

From around the 1970s, colour photography gained ascendancy in Nigeria, led by an indigenous studio in Lagos called StudioLand. Mbopo photographs which had hitherto been only in black and white were now re-visualized. Among the collection of photographs and images used by Imeh in 2012 study, Daughters of Seclusion, is the colour photograph reproduced below (Fig 2.3) of two seated mbopo initiates flanked by attendants and admirers. Imo Imeh uses the photograph to symbolize “a new imaginative moment” in the honorific celebration of initiates, He points to the seated position of the initiated, the parasols held to shade them, the staff

---

245 Vanguard Newspaper: Interview with Reuben Ajayi, one of the first Nigerian photographers to be trained in Colour Photography Technology by Agfa-Gevaert School of Photography, Germany in 1966. He started working with Studio Land in Lagos in 1969, training other photographers in colour photography and also managing the Colour Laboratory. It was around this period onward that colour photography moved to other parts of Nigeria, and eventually to Ibibio land around the 1980s, [https://allafrica.colour om/stories/200612070898.html](https://allafrica.colour om/stories/200612070898.html), accessed on 4 September 2018.
gathered in their honour by the woman elder to their rights, the group of attendants that flank them can be compared to the routines of powerful traditional chiefs and paramount rulers who were treated with honour and prestige in traditional African cultures.246

This honorific re-narration of the mbopo resonates with what Stephen Sprague in 2003 claims when he states that photography functioned as “literary record, memory device, and an object symbolizing respect and status.”247 The spiritual connotations in Talbot’s and Jeffreys’ ethnographies are absent in Imeh’s art history re-rendering. He sees mbopo as attuned to corporeal beautification and aesthetics. This kind of consciousness is enhanced by the availability of colored photographs from 1970s and the 1980s, which allow for yet another visual re-imagination of mbopo institution.

Fig. 2.3: Two decorated mbopo initiates seated in the midst of admirers

246 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 188.
Imeh’s description of the above image (Fig. 2.3) is replete with colour. He depicts the umbrellas as red and white, the staff as decorated with red, white and other colourful ribbons. He refers to the red and glow of the initiates’ skin, “which have been doused and massaged with camwood.” \(^{248}\) Though the image is presented as a grayish black-and-white photocopy in Imeh’s book as it is reproduced here, his description evokes the colour-based original. This photograph was not dated by Imeh. He does not claim to have taken it. Since the photograph is a colour image, based on Imeh’s description above, we can assume the photograph to date from the 1970s or later, when colour photography became popular in southern Nigeria. For the purpose of this chapter, I now will take a “close-up gaze” at the image as its details resonate with the cultural changes that have attended \textit{mbopo} after independence.

The photograph reinforces Salmons’ claim that after the Civil War, elderly women insisted that \textit{mbopo} initiates should be garbed in a manner that covered their bodies. The initiates who are seated in the image are covered around the chest with half-cut wrappers that are normally tied at the back. Unlike in Figs 1.2 and 1.3, where the initiates were almost completely naked and presented themselves bare-chested, here the initiates are covered, particularly the sensitive parts of their womanhood, showcasing the changes over time in the practice of this seclusion rite. After the Biafran War, the earlier cultural narrative of nakedness as a sign of virtue and a deterrence to patriarchal delinquency had begun to crumble. Women’s voices also contributed to revisualising and repositioning \textit{mbopo}, and redefining a version that portrays women’s bodies in ethical ways. \(^{249}\)

\(^{248}\) J. Imeh, \textit{Daughters of Seclusion}, 188.
\(^{249}\) J. Salmon, “Foreword” xv.
The initiates in Imeh’s image are seated on wooden armchairs. The choice of the armchairs shows their dignified status. They are lavishly decorated with exotic beads around the neck and waist, beads which reconnect them with their history. Beads are decorative materials for ritual initiates, whether male or female, all over southern Nigeria and Africa in general. Some beads signify sacredness and status, and are commonly worn by traditional chiefs and matriarchs. Others symbolize aesthetics and wealth. The more lavish the beads were, the more they speak to the wealth of the family of the initiates or their suitors. Their legs are decorated with awok, heavy brass metallic rings worn like socks rising from the ankle in ringlet form up to the thighs. This awok points to the metallurgical technology that had existed in Ibibio land and adjoining Igbo communities for many centuries. In some occasions, when the rings are very heavy, simple lifting or raising the legs is arduous work. The legs of such initiates would also be lubricated and massaged with herbs and local oils to enable them bear the weight of the awok. The legs might also be decorated with odung, ndom and iduot (local chalks, dyes and herbs) before the awok is worn. The awok, and the decorative materials added to the beautification and grandeur of the celebrated initiates. Brass-made awok was very expensive and could only be afforded by wealthy families. As such, it symbolized affluence and ostentation. It also symbolized the health and wellbeing of the initiates who had just graduated from their seclusion rite. Being able to walk with the heavy metallic ringlets without limping was seen as a sign of an auspicious success of the seclusion experience.

250 O. Akpabio, He Dared, 131-135.
251 Ibid., 131.
252 Ibid., 131.
In my early days of growing up, I observed that where initiates could not afford to buy awok, alternative decorative ornaments made of wooly materials and decorated with beads and small bells were used for their leg decorations as seen in Fig 2.4 above. Here we have a screenshot of the leg of an ekombi dancer performing in a music video by Sir Wilker Johnson; an indigenous Efik musician. Since ekombi dance is a reminiscence of mbopo performance, the attire used for the dance performances are identical to those mbopo initiates wore during their outing ceremonies. The small bells are used to imitate the metallic clamping sounds that awok makes while the initiate was dancing. The clamping sound from the small bell synchronized systematically with the steps and movements of the initiate or in this case, the ekombi dancer.

---

253 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kqy6oCi18ig, accessed on 2 October 2018.
254 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kqy6oCi18ig, accessed on 2 October 2018.
One image too many: forces of protest against female circumcision in mbopo, 1990 -2014

From around 1990, new forms of social consciousness emerged to challenge traditional practices globally. One example was an internally generated, but foreign sponsored feminist movement to outlaw female circumcision in Africa, including Nigeria where it was still most widely practiced. Activists campaigned and raised public awareness by describing female circumcision as gender-related abuse and a violent crime against women and girls. As discussed earlier in the previous chapter, this awareness was fanned by global organizations and NGOs who pushed for the total eradication of female circumcision in Nigeria.

One leading organization in the campaign was the Performance Studio Workshop. Chuck Mike, a Nigerian theatre activist and the founding director of Performance Studio Workshop, used theatre presentations and provocative visual images through his SISTER HELP (Synergizing Information Systems toward Enhancing Reproductive Health and Eradicating Ligate Practices) initiative to document the damaging consequences of female circumcision in the very communities that had most tenaciously promoted the practice in earlier decades in Edo State in Nigeria.²⁵⁵

Chuck Mike and his associates used the combination of theatre activism and “visualizing brutality,” borrowing the concept from the notion of “picturing atrocity” theorized by Jay Prosser et al²⁵⁶ to strike to the very core of traditional beliefs and cultural practice. In 1995, influenced by Chuck Mike’s video, Stella Omoregie, a one-time active and resilient traditional circumciser from the Benin Royal Family publicly came out as a convert. She encouraged other traditional circumcisers to form an indigenous practitioners’ platform that lead the anti-female circumcision campaign by going from village to village in Edo state, educating their kinsmen and women about the dangers of the circumcision on girls and young women. Combined with Mike’s theatre presentations in public spaces, which later form part of a documentary film, they called for the total eradication of female circumcision in Edo State and in Nigeria in general.\footnote{C. Mike, \textit{Uncut – Playing with Life}, accessed on 24 August 2014.}

\textit{Uncut – Playing with Life}, a documentary film that blends real life scenes, interviews, voice-over narration, and staged theatre in order to dramatize the abuse, social and health consequences of female circumcision. A disturbing scene of real-life genital mutilation of a baby-girl of about one year old is featured. Interviews are conducted in the film with Stella Omorogie (the lead protagonist), Chuck Mike (the director), Bunmi Lana (the associate director), some groups of traditional circumcisers, traditional chiefs, and the head-priest of the Benin Kingdom, medical doctors, and legislators in the Edo State House of Assembly.\footnote{Ibid.}

Following Robert Rosenstone’s assertion that visual media that are cast within the framework of drama and fiction can be useful resources to think about the past as long as they engage directly or implicitly, the issues and arguments of an ongoing discussion of history,\footnote{R. Rosenstone, \textit{Visions of the Past}, 3.} then \textit{Uncut – Playing with Life} becomes a historical exposé and a resource that elucidates how female circumcision was practiced in the mid-1990s. In theorizing about \textit{Picturing Atrocity}, Jay Prosser asserts that there are times when “pictures of atrocities are more powerful than the words that describe them.” He further opines that in this age of multimedia hyperactivity, the “still iconic photographs” whether taken from a sequence of other photographs or film footage, or maybe a frozen screenshot from the scene of a film (as I have done in reproducing the image below, Fig 2.5) – may be used to represent the whole. It has “a momentous and memorable way of representing the pains of others.” Theorizing about the “wounding aperture” Kylie Thomas asserts that photographs of violence though difficult to visualize, should not deter us from engaging with them. Reading photographs of violence, in her own case study, those perpetrated during and after apartheid in South Africa as “wounding apertures,” allows us to recognize the depth of the pain of others.

!Image of a genital mutilation of a baby-girl, screenshot from Uncut-Playing with Life (1995).

Fig 2.5: A genital mutilation of a baby-girl, screenshot from Uncut-Playing with Life (1995).

The above image comes from one of the most excruciating scenes in the film. Here Chuck Mike narrated that in one of his early visits to Stella, he witnessed her attempts at circumcising a little baby-girl a year old. He persuaded her and the mother of the child to discontinue the practice. They bluntly refused based on cultural reasons. He offered to record the events on video. In the image are the “bloody fingers” of Stella Omorogie, holding a blade and cutting through the edge 262 This disturbing image is difficult to visualize. But it is reproduced here for the purpose of this mini-thesis. I am aware of the major ethical issues around reproducing this kind of image. But since this mini-thesis is not a published material, and has limited readership, I choose to include the image, hopefully to graphically represent my analysis in this section. of the baby’s tender and immature clitoris. Towards the right are the fingers of the baby’s mother who tries to steady the baby’s legs, collaborating in instituting the trauma of this innocent child. The baby’s echoing cry is followed by interviews with young girls who experienced female circumcision, asking their mother why they allowed their daughters to go through such painful ordeal.

Mike slotted the clip into the film as one of his numerous haunting visual narratives. The scene very strongly evokes Prosser et al’s assertion that “picturing atrocity has a momentous and memorable way of representing the pains of others.” Much more, the photograph above, screenshot from the scene, is an “iconic” representation of the trauma and pain of multitudes of women who have been “cut” or who were going to be cut. The iconicity of this screenshot image, the scene of the disturbing cry during the circumcision of the baby, and indeed the entire film, generated an intensity of social protest that shook the foundations of female circumcision, as well as the practice of mbopo from the 1990s through to the 21st century. A combination of real-life and staged scenes in the documentary film, with intentions of activists spoke against all forms of practices that dehumanize women. The campaign culminated in the legislation that abolished female circumcision as discussed in Chapter One.

The campaign against clitoridectomy, one of the unifying performances and the essence of seclusion, contributed to the diminishing interest in mbopo in the 1990s. What remains is maybe a small pocket of practice of the seclusion rite in some interior villages of Ibibio/Efik communities, peradventure with the exclusion of female circumcision. There have, however been attempts made to “reinvent” and “reimagine” the practice over the last decade as I explore in the next chapter. In culturally nostalgic sense, mbopo is still celebrated by dance troupes, theatrical performances, arts and crafts, music, and a staged “reality show” called the Fattening Room that was broadcast in 2013.

---

Conclusion

The modifications that have attended the practice of mbopo have been as a result of the build up of historical events. John Messenger, in studying the religious acculturation among the Annang, submits that extensive changes have occurred in all aspects of Ibibio/Efik cultural life when compared with cultural traditions before European contact. In 1914, when Nigeria emerged as a single amalgamated state, Christian missionaries exerted growing presence on people’s customs and beliefs. Many indigenous people were attracted to Christianity, given its educational and health benefits. A new generation of young converts, along with their missionaries, constituted a formidable social front that contested what they represented as esoteric ritualism and excessive sensuality that accompanied mbopo practices. The photographic record of the early 20th century includes symbolic group portraits of westernized chiefs within African communities.

This acculturation process did not go without tension. Indigenous elders who were bent on maintaining their traditional system felt threatened by fellow citizens who had converted to Christianity. Jeffrey reveals that, during the 19920s and 1930s in Ikot Ekpene, such tensions resulted in brutality and even death.

The political situation in Nigeria in the 1960s further impacted on the changing context that led to modifications to mbopo. The 3-year long Civil War, just seven years after independence, devastated the Ibibio/Efik land and other regions, fundamentally disrupting cultural traditions. In the 1980s, the return of social stability allowed for some of cultural revival. Mbopo was again celebrated and reenacted among the Ibibio/Efik. This came to be short-lived, due to the emergence of another very strong opposing social force.

In 1995 Chuck Mike and his SISTER HELP initiative utilized a powerful effect of “images of atrocity” to publicize the consequences of what feminist activists termed “Female Genital Mutilation/Cut.” As we have seen, his campaign created a cultural revolution through which female circumcision was altered and eventually mbopo institution had to be radically adapted. The scene and the image of a real-life mutilation of a baby-girl, “one image too many”, was the decisive moment in the battle against the practice of female circumcision in Nigeria. Between 1999 and 2015, state and federal structures of government criminalized all forms female genital mutilation in Nigeria. These laws, coupled with emerging social consciousness generated through the global networks of communications radically changed contemporary perceptions about a once deeply entrenched Ibibio/Efik cultural ritual. Today mbopo rituals have almost been confined to the annals of history, only to be reimagined by new media cultures and in contemporary performance of art and culture which actively seek to “re-invent traditions.”
Chapter Three

“The Re-Invention of Tradition:” EbonyLife TV Show and other Recent Recreations of

Mbopo, 2008-2014

The practice and perception of mbopo as an institution that precedes marriage has shifted in dramatic ways among the Ibibio/Efik people in the 21st century. It has been firmly appropriated within the realms of the media and the arts as cultural re-imagination and reinvention through TV shows, dance performance, music, visual and graphic art exhibitions etc. More so, the mbopo ritual has been reimagined and reinvented in new ways, in an attempt to satisfy a longing for cultural nostalgia and to maintain some strings of connectivity with the past. While the Fattening Room reality TV show in 2013 represents one of these new ways of re-imagining and recasting, cultural dance troupes like abang, ekombi and the “maiden dance,” which are mostly staged among Ibibi/Efik communities during important functions and towards ukaparisua[^265^], are other public expressions of this process of reinvention. Music performances that resonate with the concept and ideology of mbopo seclusion are also staged. Contemporary visual and graphic artists have also utilized the concept of mbopo to graphically evoke portions of its rich history in an attempt to “advance the general conversation about the ritual’s tenets into contemporary circles.”[^266^]

How can “Reality TV” be used as a resource for historical writing to explore the fluidity in cultural perceptions of mbopo? Neal Saye proposes that the term “Reality TV is oxymoronic.” This is so because no matter how Reality TV shows are depicted as being real, the general [^265^]: Ukaparisua is a period of each year around December when festivities, cultural functions, cultural debuts of myriads of masquerades and dance troupes, and cultural dance competitions are organized both at home and in the diaspora communities.

[^266^]: I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 261.
assumptions are that any program presented through the television is based on entertainment, which is “the supra-ideology of all discourse on television.”\textsuperscript{267} He further states that “Reality TV” which is commonly set within a “family-style arrangement,” is characterized by using ordinary people instead of professional actors with no predetermined plot. Such media (he continues) can sometimes be directed towards “understanding the ongoing social struggles over the sign of culture and the definition of social reality and its preferred meaning at any given historical moment.”\textsuperscript{268}

Most films, documentaries or Reality TV shows that are historically or culturally grounded are based on the interpretation of historical events through an engagement with a combination of documentary, visual and oral sources, reworking in an experiential interplay by the film maker. Interpretations are therefore acted out and represented in a filmic form through the subjectivity of the film maker.\textsuperscript{269} According to Francoise Pfaff, the history filmmaker can function as a “visual griot,” “a historian, a raconteur, a living memory…” of the culture of the people.\textsuperscript{270} Films, documentaries and Reality TV shows which are targeted at streaming “past and present realities” are loaded with scenes that resonate with history. They therefore have the capacity to offer “visual clues” as to how events in the past unfolded. This positions them as interpretative resource to think about history, as I do in this study.

While subjecting to close visual analysis on screenshot photographs from the \textit{Fattening Room} TV show and other online videos, this chapter argues that in contemporary times, even though there is residual evidence that points to the continuing practice of \textit{mbopo} ritual, its mainstay is \textsuperscript{268} \textit{Ibid}., 9-11.

\textsuperscript{269} R. Rosenstone, \textit{Visions of the Past}, 3-5. See also V. Bickford-Smith and R. Mendelsohn, “Introduction,” 1-3.
\textsuperscript{270} \textit{Ibid}., 14.
cultural nostalgia, reimagined and reinvented through the genre of play, entertainment and the media. I show that the Ibibio/Efik, both in Nigeria and in the diaspora, used different platforms to stage performances that connect them with the main values of mbopo even when actual seclusion ritual is not performed. Yet this process of reinvention is highly selected and is tailored to modern audiences and entertainment that any sense of cultural “authenticity” is sacrificed in service of public display.

The Fattening Room Reality TV Show, 2013

In 2013 EbonyLife TV staged a reality show, The Fattening Room, which was aired live on several TV stations in Nigeria and in some parts of Africa. The show hosted six “feisty, modern, single” African women from Ghana, Nigeria, Botswana, South Africa, Zambia and Kenya.\(^{271}\) The Fattening Room show staged a reenactment of the mbopo seclusion ritual. These young women were hosted for 30 days within a hut-based village compound, around the fringes of riverine topography in Creek Town, Calabar.\(^{272}\) The cast were between 22 and 32 years old. They were put through rigorous and unfamiliar experiences and trained in body beautification, body massaging, cooking lessons, and other domestic and craft-enhancing skills training. These were interspaced with lavish feeding bouts. This was an attempt to create an illusion of how the mbopo seclusion ritual was practiced in the past. The young women were secluded under the watch of an Efik cultural matriarch, Edak Totsman Etoty with her assistant, Ekanam Knight, along with a host of other attendants-in-waiting. Edak Etoty, a domineering and imposing figure fondly called “Aunty Dakky” by the cast members, and her assistant were themselves former initiates. This was one of the means of

\(^{272}\) Ibid.
authenticating the “reality” claim of the show. They drew on their past experiences to supervise and build the structure of the show that could align with the purported “fattening room” ritual, as a means of keeping alive this history. This is because in the past it was unacceptable for a non-initiate to perform the duty of mbopo matron in a seclusion rite.\(^{273}\)

The above photograph is one among the series of photographs that Ebonylife TV used in the advertisement reel for the reality show. It was the first image that comes up in every episode of the reality show. This and other similar photographs that are not reproduced here were taken at the same site showing participants in similar attire. They were used to visually announce the show on TV stations. This composition is set up to awaken the viewers to the dynamism and sophistication that is expected of the show as it unfolds. It is a sensational visual presentation of the six “feisty young women.” The advertisement reel that announces this photograph is presented in a fast-paced mode that is used to draw viewers’ attention to the show, and to evoke a sense of curiosity that would persuade a viewer to stay with the show.

Set within the architectural background of a pre-colonial Efik elite family house in the tropical topography of Calabar, the photograph connects with “a traditional rural” historical backdrop, while still being fixed within a modern aesthetic. The subjects are dressed in elaborate and dazzling old fashioned “French” novelty gowns. Their probing gazes into the camera suggest their readiness to face the unfamiliar but exhilarating cultural encounters they are set to meet. Robed in a manner far removed from the cultural practices of mbopo, “the fattening room” inscription on the photograph insists on their historical connection with the ritual.

The “white skin” of Sally, the South African creates a colour effect for the staged composition. Stephanie, the Ghanaian participant dressed in a purple gown, takes the centre stage. With her arms akimbo on her waist, she draws attention to the slimness of her physique. Her slick figure undermines the notion of “fattening.” The photograph resonates with Imeh’s notion of “staging as a concept of the modern-day interpretation…and performance of traditional rituals within the framework of entertainment, pedagogy and collective memory.” At the same time, some elements of “reality” effect were played out during the show. Some of the “girls” mentioned that they did observe some dimples around their waists, a sign that they did really gain some weight during the show.

The cultural structure that was strictly identifiable with partly-naked parades of young girls as a show of virtue is here reenacted with persons of foreign background garbed in complete Western-style dresses. Mbopo is now represented by exquisitely and elegantly dressed

---

274 Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 254.
275 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_QVJXnMWnq8&t=537s, accessed on 20 September 2018.
multicultural inductees in a moment of fantasized re-imagination. A practice that was grounded in strict cultural injunctions (including ascertaining if the inductee to-be was a virgin, performing female circumcision, with sacrifices and rituals targeted at consecrating the expected initiate to divine deities etc.) in 1914 was staged 100 years later without any of these restrictive cultural orders of the past.

The photograph above and the TV show it represents evoke the lifestyle of today’s Ibibio/Efik young women entwined with some strands of cultural affinity to the past. The influence of modernity from different strands of the society and the locally generated desire to remain connected to one’s cultural origin has produced among the Ibibio/Efik young women who pursue modern sophistication in dressing and lifestyles, but who are also connected to their culture through food, music, dance, arts and nuptial etiquette.

The 22 episodes of the show run from 10 to 25 minutes each with a voice-over narrative and sometimes indigenous Efik music in the background. The show makes no reference at all to most of the basic components of the ritual like circumcision, sacrifice, or the certification of sexual virtues, that were essential to the ritual practice in the past. The show was a colourful blend of selected indigenous cultural practices with a lot of modern cultural inventions. The inductee had meetings with certain professionals including female fashion and beauty consultants, music instructors and singers, and career consultants. They attended gym and went out to jog. They engaged in multi-tasking management and presentation exercises, and some of the activities and games that define a modern society woman. On the other hand, a few activities resonate with mbopo, particularly in the area of learning certain crafts and home management skills from matrons. Most were blatantly fictive like reciting poems, music competitions, being blindfolded before being taken to certain locations, and going out for teaching exercise in a primary school.
The show was loaded with scenes that show interplay between sophisticated modernity and culturally determined practices. The “seclusion village,” where the inductees were housed for The Fattening Room show, is different from ufok mbopo, mbopo ritual’s seclusion room in the past. Unlike the ufok mbopo, which used to be a temporary converted restrictive room or hut for the few months of seclusion, the “seclusion village” of the show was a spatially arranged “resort,” where inductees moved freely around all facilities within the village. While in “seclusion,” the cast were dressed in attire consonant with that of mbopo initiates after the Civil War in 1970. They were constantly rubbed with local chalks, oils and herbs. They were treated to body massages, and fed sumptuous Ibibio/Efik delicacies and palm wine. They were also treated to a cocktail of packaged fruit juices and Western snacks, particularly when they were outside the “seclusion village” and within the parlor setting.

Every morning, while in the village, the “girls” were awoken by the banging of a local gong, supposedly reminiscent of the “oramedia” an enduring system of communication in Africa, where word of mouth accompanied by the sounds of a gong, trumpet or drum were used to disseminate information in communities.276 The gong was a call to assemble at the centre of the village or at the River Deck house (where a meeting hut was situated along the riverbank). Here Aunty Dakki addressed the “girls” on the expected events of the day, and inquired about their progress. Each day began with a wash with locally made toiletries: a body sponge made from plant fibres and natural black soap “with about 11 secret natural ingredients.”277 The inductees washed their bodies in a locally constructed open-roof and raffia-walled make-shift bathroom. They were dressed in costumes. They were then taken through a sequence of body massages, body decorations and adornment. After this, they were treated to a sumptuous meal. They now received lessons on cultural functions like how to cook indigenous meals and how to dance. They learned some tips about the Ibibio/Efik language, folklore and history, and how to sing indigenous love songs. These activities depended on what the schedule of the day was, as proposed by the matriarch.

277 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_QVJXnMWmQ8&t=537s, accessed on 18 September 2018.

The photograph above is a colour screenshot photograph from one of the scenes in Episode 9 where the inductees were treated to elaborate and lavish body painting and decoration. They also had intensive massaging with local chalks, oils and herbal concoctions, and drank litres of water “to loosen the body up so as to be fat.”\(^{278}\) This resonates with the skin decoration, skin care and massage exercises that initiates did experience during the \textit{mbopo} seclusion rite.

\footnote{\textsuperscript{278} Roselyn Ashkar’s interview during the TV show, \url{https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NFpFQ9VQiNA&t=282s}, accessed on 18 September 2018.}
The backdrop behind Sally, the South African inductee, shows a mixture of cultures with national insignia. We can see the South African flag, which represents her identity and registers her continued loyalty to her motherland, despite the cultural dislocation. Yet the carved monument and the red-minted cyclic print on the clay-painted wall speak to her momentary relocation and immersion into a novel cultural experience: the Ibibio/Efik “fattening room.” The cyclical textured prints on the wall are similar to the nsibidi hieroglyphic writing that was common with mbopo institution and serve as cultural insignia that connect The Fattening Room show with history and with mbopo historicity more specifically.

Sally is skin-painted and decorated with local chalks, oils and dyes, and dressed in a manner that reflects the ways mbopo initiates were dressed in the past. While her body functioned as a canvas to showcase the beautiful design and artistic initiatives of Ibibio/Efik femininity, the mmong-mmong motif on her face (see Chapter 2) portrays her as a member of a riverine-based community in Ibibio/Efik land. From the tip of her nose, the design symbolizes a flowing river that expands across her forehead. The flow splits into two channels on the right and the left cheeks, and empties into the rest of the body as droplets. This facial motif echoes an enduring belief and reverence attached to particular rivers and streams, which are seen as the source of vitality and fertility in some communities in Ibibio/Efik land. There are many facial designs like this that echo the different identities and status of the initiates. But this kind of motif is also replicated through movement: the ekombi dancer’s movement, whose dance steps and movements mimic the waves and the motions of the sea, as they connect with the romantic gesticulations of Ibibio/Efik brides.

---

279 I. Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion, 75-76.
280 D. A. Talbot, Woman’s Mysteries of a Primitive People, 76.
281 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=a-OUsEJy8k, accessed on 2 October 2018.
Learning how to sing and dance was part of the activities that went on within mbopo seclusion space in the past. The Fattening Room reality show afforded the inductees ample time to learn several Ibibio/Efik songs and dance performances. Professional dancers like the ekombi dancers were invited to teach the participants to sing and dance. Through precise body twisting movements and gesticulations, the concept of dance was clearly articulated on how it resonates with love, femininity, family and nature. Music was supplied by a group of indigenous Efik cultural troupes. They drummed and sang sonorously with music renditions that allowed the dancers to respond synchronously to the rhythms of local lyrical music. On some occasions, instrumental music drawn from indigenous or African lyrics was supplied between the scenes to generate a relaxing mood for viewers as scenes rolled into other scenes.

Fig 3.3: Inductees rehearsing the ekombi dance steps that they were taught earlier, The Fattening Room, Episode 10.

The above photograph is a screenshot from Episode 10 of The Fattening Room show. Here initiates are seen rehearsing ekombi dance steps that they were taught earlier by Efik ekombi dancers. They hold their hands up and try to swerve in imitation of the waves of the sea. The backdrop shows the huts that housed the inductees in the “seclusion village.” The roofs are thatched, made of raffia palm branches called “nkanya.” The walls are made of clay plaster and are covered with local paints made from a mixture of herbs and wild plants. Behind the “girls,” we can see a locally made clay pot and a raffia bamboo arm chair. These connect to the feeding and body massaging processes, as complementary approaches towards achieving corpulence for the inductees. On the far right, we see one of the ladies-in-waiting who were assigned to attend to the inductees. Her presence in the background resonates with the supervisory treatment that mbopo initiates received in the past. Although some of the services rendered to the inductees by the attendants were highly exaggerative.

---

Fig 3.4: Ekombi dancers performing a dance along with inductees, The Fattening Room, Episode 17, 2013.

The above screenshot shows two ekombi dancers performing on stage with three Fattening Room “girls” in Episode 17. While performing, the initiates continued to learn how to sing and dance Ibibio/Efik love songs. The ekombi dancers are dressed in yellow woven beads around the neck.
and the shoulders; colourful beads and heavily beaded waist bands; colourful raffia-made hand and leg bands; half-cut waist wrappers; and decorated faces and m kpuk eba coiffures\(^\text{283}\) as a finishing touch. Their dress is similar to those of the Fattening Room “girls” except for the colour schemes and the beaded necklaces.

In the past, initiates were taught how to cook, make crafts items and dance. These activities were replicated in the Fattening Room show. But the way they were played out, runs counter to the “traditional” principles that guided their operation historically. For example, male drummers of the kind who appear at the back of the dancers in Fig 3.4 were only supposed to be contracted for drumming at urua mbopo, the outing ceremony. Men were not permitted to access the seclusion space. Men were only permitted to access to the space at the conclusion of the ritual, to admire and appreciate the young initiates.\(^\text{284}\)

The seclusion of the inductees in the Fattening Room “seclusion village” did not continue to the end of the show. At the end of Episode 10, the “girls’ bade farewell to the village and were relocated to more sophisticated and grandiose duplex quarters: though they had intermittent visits back to the village, when their activities had crossed the line of modernity. In the “modern quarters”, they were detached from the “traditional” experiences in the “seclusion village.” They still remained under the mentorship of Aunty Dakki and her assistant.

A break from the “village” and traditional culture and the movement into “the modern quarters” as it is called in the episode embodies the kind of movement that mbopo practices and perceptions have gone through between 1914 and 2013 when the show was cast. Mbopo has

---

\(^{283}\) The hairstyles adorned by the ekombi dancers in Fig 3.4 bear the name mpuk eba which means “new breast.” They were worn by initiates and other young women who were virgins. The coiffure was one other identity that symbolises the sexual status of Ibibio/Efik girls in the past. See N. Udeme, “Mbopo Institution”, 4.

transcended its former spatial seclusion to be recast in wider contexts. It has moved from serving as a valuable sociocultural tool for marriage into the realm of cultural recreation, imagined through the media, entertainment shows, music, and cultural dance performance. It is also symbolized through contemporary dress codes used during marriage ceremonies, where brides, particularly the Efik brides, still wear marriage clothes reminiscent those worn at the mbopo rituals.

Marital dress, painting and contemporary forms of reinventions of the mbopo ritual

The Efik in particular have kept a strong attachment to the mbopo adornment of the past. So much so that when girls who may have lived all their lives in the cities outside of Ibibio/Efik land or even outside Nigeria come home for their marriage rituals, they appear in a similar manner or adopt a certain dress code that is reminiscent of mbopo initiates. Some adopt the hairdo, the half-cut waist wrapper, the elaborate beads, the flywhisk or staff of office, the face painting and motif, or put on the awok: the metallic leg rings. Others adopt one or more of these dress codes that resonate with mbopo seclusion in their marriage attire. In the moment when the bride is ushered out to meet the bridegroom, the audience typically cries out, uyai mbopo, (“beautiful maiden”), where mbopo symbolises beauty, corporeal voluptuousness and the honour of marriage.
Fig 3.5: Koko Ita-Giwa during her marriage in Calabar, 2014. Source: Linda Ikeji.285

The above image is a photograph of Koko Ita-Giwa, the daughter of Florence Ita-Giwa, a politician and a former Nigerian legislator representing the Cross River South Constituency.286 It was taken in September 2014 during her marriage ceremony in Calabar. The image was posted online by Linda Ikeji, a Nigerian freelance online photo analyst. It was a way to celebrate Koko and her mother for a successful marriage ceremony287. The hand of a bridal attendant dressed in raffia wool arm band and the faces of admirers are seen in the left corner of the photograph. Koko is seated on a platform specifically and beautifully decorated like a royal throne in her honour as the bride. From my experience, this kind of decorated platform is common in Ibibio/Efik marriage ceremonies in recent times. Her entire dress pattern resonate those of mbopo initiates of the past. It is similar to how The Fattening Room “girls” and the ekombi dancers appear in Fig.3.4. She is colourfully adorned with a woven bead necklace. She wears a half-cut wrapper, staff of office and an elaborate coiffure. This dress code is deeply connected to mbopo rituals as we have shown in previous chapters. Through dress, marriage ceremonies can thus afford modern Ibibio/Efik brides the opportunity to be constantly connected to the mbopo culture, even when the bride did not go through any form of seclusion rite.

Fig 3.6: “Mechanisms in Uyai by Imoh Imeh, 2010” Source: Cover page, Imeh, Daughters of Seclusion.

Another way in which mbopo has been reimagined in the 21st century has been through visual and graphic art. Visual scholars have found fascination in choosing to interpret their understanding of the traditional forms of mbopo ritual through creative works and through scholarship. This is motivated by the awareness of the decline of the practice and the possibility of it being forgotten among Ibibio/Efik people. Artists and art scholars therefore choose to use their visual and creative designs and work as curators as a means to “recall and record, and preserve traditional Ibibio/Efik cultural forms.”

Above is a reproduction of a large-scale painting by Imo Imeh in 2010, the culmination of his reflection and conception of mbopo as producing an “iconic bride.” Imeh asserts that in the face of the decline of mbopo practice in the 21st century, he used an eight-foot tall canvas to depict the mbopo bride as a beautiful, ethical and spiritual icon that continues to resonate within the aesthetic and ideological framework of the Ibibio/Efik culture. The choice of the mammoth size of the canvas by Imeh is his way of affirming his perception of mbopo as a “legendary conceptual dimension of the iconic bride,” whose philosophy and ideology is continuously grounded within the Ibibio/Efik sociocultural framework, both at home and among the diaspora community.

The painting is a complex artistic representation of the diverse and multifaceted activities that were part of the seclusion ritual to reproduce a voluptuous bride, post-seclusion. In its full glare, the painting mirrors on the background an inexperienced initiate who through the meticulous hands of her matrons has been transformed into a confident and beautiful bride. Her coiffure references the coiled hair-styles of past brides whose bodies and adornments were embodiments of feminine pride and prestige. The network of webs that is loosely superimposed on the “fattened bride” depicts the network of activities that were invested during seclusion to produce this “icon of beauty.” The “mechanisms in uyai” or beauty, as proposed by Imeh, presupposes

289 Ibid., 272.
290 Ibid., 272.
the cultural aesthetics, moral formations and spiritual immersion that collectively worked in the seclusion to produce a bride adorned with beads, body motifs, and elaborate coiffure as “accoutrements of power.”

Through the genre of art, mbopo continues to be reimagined and preserved on canvas, through drawing in the 21st century.

Dance and music are other forms in which mbopo ritual is reimagined. Akpapan and Akpapan have shown that music was an integral part of the mbopo ritual. It functioned as a cultural element to enforce morality, provoke creativity, and encourage social belonging. Some of the vernacular songs and lullabies that are still sung within the home resonate with mbopo.

Established Ibibio/Efik musicians like Udo Abiangha and Sir Wilker Jackson, and a number of others, directly reference the ritual in their work. Lyrics like “ami nyonke ndima eboi oh” (I don’t want to fall in love with a promiscuous woman) by Udo Abiangha, and “eyen Akpabuyo mme-mma ido afo” (Akpabuyo young woman, I love your virtuousness) by Sir Wilker Jackson articulate the values and the virtues that were embedded in the Ibibio/Efik pattern of marriage in the past. They call for a reconnection with mbopo values for the betterment of the family life and Ibibio/Efik society and culture. Akpabuyo is one of the Efik riverine communities where mbopo ritual might still be practiced in the recent times. In the song titled Eyen Akpabuyo which was released in March 2015, Sir Wilker Jackson uses his lyrics and the visuals in the video to eulogize a representation of Akpabuyo young women who he claims are still holding unto sexual virtuousness and modest lifestyles. He asserts that this Akpabuyo young woman refused to be

---

291 Ibid., 275.
294 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kqy6oCi18ig&start_radio=1&list=RDEMiDza5crckbvoNr69mQkbEw, accessed on 2 October 2018.
influenced and be corrupted by the alluring promiscuities and frivolities that are prevalent in the Calabar metropolis. This then makes eyen Akpabuyo to be attracting and marriageable.

There are also cultural dance troupes like ekombi dancers (see Fig.3.4) and the abang dancers whose performances are reminiscent of mbopo rituals. These dance troupes are sometimes invited to perform during marriage celebrations and in community-based cultural festivals at the end of every year. The diaspora communities of Ibibio/Efik people are also connected to the cultures of mbopo and their homeland through annual convocations of festival gatherings. In an attempt to evoke their identity as Ibibio/Efik people in a foreign land, some import or stage dance troupes that reference the mbopo ritual in recent times. Though the dancers may not have been secluded or pass through the mbopo ritual, the staged dance known as “maiden dance” is one example of this reimagining mbopo.

The Akwa Ibom State Association of Nigeria (AKISAN), USA, founded in 1968 as a way of supporting South Eastern students in the USA during the Biafran War years, and recently metamorphosed into a broader Akwa Ibom ethnic-based association celebrate their cultural heritage through their Cultural Extravaganza Programs. They do stage the “maiden dance” at their annual National Convention as a way of promoting indigenous cultural forms, like mbopo, through dance, music and fashion.
The above screenshot image shows young Ibibio women in the United States performing the “maiden dance,” a depiction of mbopo dance during one of the Cultural Extravaganza programs of Ibibio Communities in USA. This was held during the Mboho Mparawa Ibibio USA Inc. 2012 Annual Convention. The dancers are dressed in a manner that references mbopo outfits. They are dressed in half-cut blouses and knee-length wrappers. The hands, legs and the waist bands have colourful “furs” made of raffia wools. These are common decorative materials that connect the “maiden dance” and its performance with the mbopo ritual. The girls dance to local lyrics that announce the virtues of modesty and celebrate the beauties inherent in Ibibio marriage norms. The dancers moved synchronously to the music, twisting their waists and shaking their bodies in not-so-easy amorous gestures. These are typical of the music and the dance of mbopo initiates at their outing ceremonies, as represented in the performance of ekombi dancers in the Fattening Room episode.

The backdrop of the image features a community of Ibibio indigenes residents in the United State and robed in indigenous styled regalia. The men are dressed with hats, shirts and wrappers, while the women are dressed in white lace blouses, wrappers and high profile headgear and beads. These styles of dress feature in Ibibio/Efik cultural festivals. Apart from the USA flag that hangs by the wall, one might be led to think that the event was held in an Ibibi/Efik environment in Nigeria.

---

295 Mboho Mkparawa Ibibio, Virginia, USA is a subsidiary of AKISAN, USA, www.youtube.com/watch?v=9q-Xhw6J4co, accessed on 2 October 2018.

While there may be a dearth of the mbopo seclusion rite practiced among the Ibibio/Efik community in the 21st century, there is a continual reminiscence around the practice through music, performance and dance. There is also an enduring connection of Ibibio/Efik people with the main ideals of mbopo ritual: the beauty(character) combination, where beauty is conceived to exceed the boundaries of physical appeal to the aesthetic sense of sight. Beauty is considered as an embodiment of both corporeal aesthetic appeal and the fineness of character and moral etiquette. These contemporary practices and performances that reimagine mbopo and connect the people to its conceptual ideology are attempts targeted at reinforcing the coveted values and virtues of the mbopo ritual, as well as character that are earnestly sought after in many typical Ibibio/Efik families. These values are threatened by what I regard as “moral porousness”, where the boundaries of chastity before marriage that were articulated through mbopo ritual are losing their relevance in contemporary volatile Ibibio/Efik social landscape.
Conclusion

This thesis is primarily based on visual theory and history. It reinforces my interest in conceptualizing and analysing the connection between the aesthetics of the body and other extra-corporeal activities embodied in African cultural practices. Through the use of visual images and forms, I have sought to demonstrate how tangible cultural practices like mbopo ritual, are not fixed, but are recreated and reinvented within a changing sociocultural environment. I have sought to demonstrate how visual materials, photographic and films are powerful mechanisms through which cultural change can be historically analysed. I have identified source materials across a century to piece together a kind of chronology and context for the study of mbopo. I self-consciously constructed my own archive of mbopo through diverse sources and imaginatively piecing them together to create a historicized and visually oriented reimagining of how we can think about mbopo as a cultural ritual, past and present. This archive has been sourced from scholarly books and articles in university libraries in South Africa and in the United States, but also through extensive and in-depth internet research.

I have then sought to analyse these visual materials. In this regard I have used close visual analysis of photographic images, screenshots images and film to identify visual details and explore their meanings and symbolisms. I have shown very detailed attention to elements within an image but also to how they relate to one another in composition, framing and backdrop. At times, I have drawn on my own cultural history as an Annang man who grew up in Ibibioland to interpret these images. I have sought to ground my readings of particular images in my in-depth “insider” knowledge of items of material culture, motifs, tattoos, body painting and other cultural adornments. Here my understanding has increasingly been enriched by the work of artists and scholars in the field of visual studies, primarily Imeh, whose creative effort to re-imagine mbopo as an aesthetic form worthy of recollection and reinvention served as a source of inspiration.

In thematic terms, I have constructed a chronology of the ritual which shows the extent to which cultural change, context and visual forms frame the way we can think about mbopo at different periods. I articulate on how these changes align with significant historical events in the Nigerian politics and in the Ibibio/Efik community. In this sense, I began by reflecting on the ethnographic framework of the 1910s when mbopo still had some sense of secrecy and spiritual mystery, a degree of vibrancy. This early ethnographic framework is epitomized by Dorothy Talbot’s richly illustrated study of 1914. But already by the 1920s, when Mervyn Jeffreys served as a colonial official in Ibibioland, he reported on a ritual undergoing change. The missionaries and their African converts all too often commissioned mbopo as backward, barbaric superstitious practice. The professional anthropological studies and fieldworks from the 19930s to the 1950s uncover cultural changes but also deepening cultural conflicts. I have also reflected on how there was increasingly a buildup of tension on the ritual by modern forces, not only the outside missionaries, but also of indigenous agents. A new generation of Christianized youths, an emerging educated group and colonially upgraded elites were increasingly critical of the ritual. They challenged indigenous elders who wanted to maintain the status quo.

During the 1960s, however, there was a more radical rupture with a complete cutting through the spirit of the ritual. We have seen how Nigeria’s post-independence government was insensitive to ethic politics and was now riddled with corruption. Above all the three years of a devastating war had massive environmental and cultural consequences. Between 1967 and 1970, mbopo was physically difficult to perform because of the environmental devastation during the war. With little reprieve, this was followed by the feminists critique of the 1980s and 1990s, symbolized by the visually driven, global and national campaigns to uproot the practice of clitoridectomy as well as mbopo ritual with which it was associated.

There is a symbolic moment in 1995 that represents a radical critique of the fundamental elements of mbopo from which it could never recover. The SISTER HELP initiative, especially with the mass publicization through the “Uncut” video and political campaigns mobilized against the practice of female circumcision set mbopo as ethically unsustainable. Clitoridectomy was much more fundamental defined as “Female Genital Mutilation/Cut.” The mbopo ritual came to be seen as morally tainted. The outcome was federal and states legislations between 1999 and 2015 which totally outlawed all forms of female genital mutilation. This moment redefined the way in which people perceived the ritual, which has not been able to recover in any authentic traditional cultural form. A core aspect of the ritual, clitoridectomy, contaminated the whole concept of mbopo and left the long-standing ritual facing cultural restriction.

Between 2008 and 2014, however, there has been a dynamic and diverse process of cultural reinventions with differing degree of authenticities. In some forms, like those of the 2013 reality TV show, The Fattening Room, mbopo served as a cultural prop for a celebrity-styled fabrication of rituals of beautification. The mbopo matrons of old gave way now to the beauty products and rampant entertainment of contemporary world. Other forms of reinventions were on my reading closely authentic, creatively reflecting or repositioning the rich and aesthetic legacy of mbopo in contemporary expressions through artwork, dress, performance and textual description.

Whether in its colonial, late colonial, post independent or contemporary recreations, the complex and culturally rich visual and performative world of mbopo offers a dynamic case study of contestation and conflict in relation to the meaning and legacy of African indigenous ritual.
Visual sources, like photographs, videos, films and other visual forms offer a surprisingly rich archive through which cultural “continuities and change”, and conflicts can be recorded. They contributed in shaping how people have understood and sought to transform mbopo.
Bibliography

Ekong, I. “The Ibibio Concept of Peace and its Implications for Preaching: A Practical Theological Study within the Akwa Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Nigeria”, (PhD dissertation, Stellenbosch University, 2014).

INTERNET SOURCES

C. Mike, Uncut – Playing with Life, a documentary film on FGM/https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=QsJTZcCoJS_c

Fattening Room Show, Episode 10, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NFpFQ9VQiNA.

http://etd.uwc.ac.za/

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=a-OUsEJyj8k, accessed on 2nd October 2014.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kqv6oCi18ig&start_radio=1&list=RDEMiDza5crckbvoNr69mQkbEw

Mbombo Mkparawa Ibibio, Virginia, USA is a subsidiary of AKISAN, USA, www.youtube.com/watch?v=9q-Xhw6J4co

Nigeria: Current information on the practice of female genital mutilation; state protection available to those being targeted and the ethnic groups which it is prevalent (June 2001-October 2003), http://www.refworld.org/docid/403dd2080.html.

Roselyn Ashkar’s interview during the TV show. https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NFpFQ9VQiNA&t=282s.

“Sexual and Reproductive Health: Classification of Female Genital Mutilation”, http://www.who.int/reproductivehealth/topics/fgm/overview/en/.

The Fat Houses, Documentary Film, 2012, http://www.journeyman.tv

The Fattening Room of the Efiks (online article) http://www.nairaland.com/2097222/fattening-rooms-efik.
